SIRL CONTROLLER WE FULL FOR.

A LETTER, &c.

SIR,

PERMIT me to introduce this letter with that well-authenticated observation of Solomon, "Give instruction (or admonition) to a wife "man, and he will be yet wifer." Prov. ix. 9.

The inspired proverbialist supposes, that even a wise man may err; thro' ignorance, prejudice of education, or inadvertence, — that a consciousness of his fallibility will make him, however, self-diffident, teachable and cautious, — that humility, which is an essential characteristic of heavenly wisdom, will render him accessible even to sharp reproof, as well as mild admonition — and that salutary instruction, suggested from any quarter, will be received with thankfulness and cordiality, and make even the wise man himself, both wiser and better.

I flatter myself, that this brief comment on the words of Solomon will meet with your hearty approbation; nor am I without hopes, that you will justify me in making it the introduction to this letter; at the same time, that the success intimated in the facred text, induces me almost to conclude, that you will candidly and dispassionately weigh the friendly hints I propose laying before you, and reap from them some small advantage.

I affure you, Sir, it is far from my defign in thus citing you to the bar of the public, to act the part of the four critic, who eagerly catches atevery opportunity feverely to lash the inaccuracies of an illiterate opponent; - of the supercisious dictator, who issues out his dogmas with peremptoriness, and fuspends all his arguments on the strength of his own pompous ipfe dixit; - of the high-church-man, who, with pontifical dignity, unchurches all that are not of his communion; unchristians all that have not been baptized at his font: and makes ministerial ordination the absolute monopoly of lawn-fleeves; — much less wou'd I in the smallest degree wish to imitate the conduct of the furious zealot or contracted fectarift, who upon the flightest difference in opinion, is ready to call for fire from heaven, or rather from hell, to confume his adversaries. No, God forbid! that my heart shou'd be influenced, or my pen guided, by fuch a malevolent, cynical, dictatorial, bigoted spirit! I hope I have not so learned Christ.

Probably if it had fallen to the lot of some other person to animadvert on, what I mean only to treat in a way of expostulation, you would have been accosted with the ironical sneer, the explicit reproof, the personal investive, or cutting farcasin. But

The present time needs not such weapons as these; especially as they are sufficiently brandished by modern disputants with an impetuosity, that greatly injures the cause of religion, and reflects no honor on the spirit of the contending parties themselves. Far be it from me then, to take up those weapons against you, Sir, which have already turned the field of controversy, into a campus martius, or a polemic aceldama; where spiritual gladiators with an unfortunate manœuvre wound the very truth they contend for, and, by cutting and hacking one another, only afford amusement to the fly spectators. Besides, as such weapons are carnal, they confequently make no part of the armor of a christian, whose peculiar glory it is, to contend earnestly, but not bitterly, for the truth once delivered to the faints.

Instead therefore of rushing on you with the fury of a heated antagonist, I mean only to address you with the calmness of a benevolent admonisher, or the faithfulness of a disinterested friend. And if in the course of my remarks I shou'd give you an inadvertent wound, I wish the instrument that makes it, may be so tempered with the oil of love, as that, you may hardly seel the edge, till with an imperceptible keenness it has performed its work. And if any of the wounds, after they are made, shou'd smart at all, I hope Solomon's words will sufficiently explain such a circumstance, and at the same time suggest a motive for patience, "Faithful are the wounds of a friend."

Perhaps

Perhaps yourself, and others, may blame me for doing that before the public, which might have been transacted in private. But the observation drops all its weight, when I consider, that the remedy wou'd not then be proportioned to the disease; yea, that it wou'd be virtually no remedy at all. For; since you act in a public character, and have frequent opportunities of displaying that spirit, which you lately did in synothing can (probably) counteract it's influence, but a public reprehension. And I look upon such a circumstance, (though indeed in some respects dissimilar,) as warranted by the spirited conduct of faithful Paul, in his public reproof of a brother Apostle. See Gal. ii. 14.

I declare it goes to my heart ever to take up my pen against any good man, especially, when he sustains the important office of a preacher of the everlasting gospel. But when good men act contrary to the genius of the gospel they preach; when they are carried away with the torrent of bigotry; when they lay such an undue stress on non-essentials, as to aggrandize them into a part of our salvation; when they attack those who differ from them with satire and acrimony; when the sentiments and conduct of ministers of the established church, are represented in such a ridiculous point of view, as to excite the laughter of an audience, which ought to be solemnized with subjects of a different nature; when such conduct tends to widen the breach between church-men and diffenters, and to augment the flame of partyprejudice, which burns too vehemently amongst us already; - I fay, when even good men betray fuch inflances of bigotted weakness, and are infirumental in doing (I hope only inadvertent) injury to the cause of Christ, it is the indispensable duty of fome to expostulate with them on such inconfistent behaviour; lest the simple shou'd be beguiled, and the progress of the gospel impeded. And however I may efteem you, Sir, and other respectable persons in your connection, as indeed I do with the greatest sincerity; yet I hope you will allow that the dearest and most venerable names are to be comparatively forgotten, where truth is concerned. I defire thus to know no man after the flesh. The excellent apology of the Philosopher is mine. Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica VERITAS.

Without any farther apologetic preamble, I proceed explicitly to do that, for which I have ventured to take up my pen; and that is calmly to expostulate with you on your late ministerial conduct; and to bring your spirit, peculiar sentiments, and mode of preaching, to the touchstone of scripture, reason, candor, and common-sense—I have not concealed my name either thro' fear or shame; but with a studious design, that the contents of this pamphlet may be candidly perused, and that the readers of it on all sides may not be unduly unduly biassed for or against the author; a circumstance, which the bare insertion of a name is sometimes too apt to occasion.

I. 1 WHEN the intention of your making a visit to this town, was announced by some of your friends in the Baptist persuasion, the expectation of fome, and the curiofity of others, were greatly excited. As every good man, by whatever party or denomination he may be distinguished, is equally dear to me in the common fellowship of the gospel, I therefore shared in the joy of your expected arrival. Perhaps indeed the motives which excited the eagerness and expectations of others, may have been different from mine. Some probably long'd for your coming, only that they might be entertained with your lively mode of preach ing; others earneftly looked out for your arrival, that they might receive from your hands the benefit of immersion; while not a few perhaps only wished for the period, that they might glory in your flesh - that you were a popular preacher; all which glorifying, by the bye, is vain. But I affure you, my joy was perfectly free from all those felfinterested motives, I rejoiced that you were coming to bear your testimony to the truths of that gospel, which alas! has but few fincere and zealous advocates in the prefent day. I gloried in the thought of your being instrumental in God's hands hands in turning finners from the error of their ways. And, fo far from envying any little popularity you may have acquired by the peculiarity of your address, I on the contrary wished the whole town might attend your preaching, if fuch attendance wou'd be a mean of bringing them to the knowledge of the Son of God. And I went fo far, as, even, in thought, to anticipate your ministerial success in the reformation of some poor Sa-ns.

Howfoever that may have turned out, I freely acknowledge, Sir, that my fanguine expectations respecting you, have exceedingly dropped; and that the principle of your procedure has not appeared to me in fo amiable a light as I cou'd have wished. I had entertained a confiderable idea of your catholicism, moderation, &c. But, Eheu! quanta de spe decidi! How have I been amazed and difappointed! fince I have been informed with what cenforious zeal you have infifted on dipping; and how very feverely you treated fuch as happen to differ from you on that most unimportant subject.

2 The great Apostle of the Gentiles gloried that "Christ fent him not to baptize" (merely or principally) "but to preach the gospel." Whereas (though I will not absolutely judge you on the subject) it feems to have been the principal defign of Mr. M. in his visit to S—y, to baptize. But, Sir, if you really thought that none of the Ministers in the established Church, or among the Dissenters, administer the ordinance of Baptism

3 However, we will wave this point, and fuppose you came to see your friends; to visit the church, as you are pleased to call the Baptists; to preach the gospel; and to dip, only en passant. Well, and what harm in this? you will fay. None in the least. All this you can do, without any controul, in this highly-favored land of civil and religious liberty. You and every diffenter may exercife all the peculiarities of your refpective denominations, without any dread of legal molestation. You are fafely screened from the storm of perfecution by the shelter of a gracious toleration; against the privileges of which, I wou'd not for the world level a fingle plea. But, while you fit comfortably under your peaceful vine, is it right to throw out wanton witticisms against the mild administration, which tolerates its existence? Can't you baptize in your peculiar mode, without fneering at the established Church which differs from you? Do you think it not fufficient to be tolerated to diffent from the establishment, unless you have a toleration likewise to inveigh against against her rites? Surely such conduct is unreafonable, ungrateful, and highly unbecoming.

4 But you think yourself authorized to throw out your censures against the established church, because, it seems, you have discovered some deficiencies in her public service. Hence I am informed, that in your fermon preparatory to the cereinony of dipping, you suggested the following addition to our Liturgy. "From salse joy, salse "considence, &c. Good Lord deliver us."

The members of the establishment are much obliged to you, Sir, for this proposed interpolation. But probably, the generality of them will concur with me in thinking it altogether unnecessary, for the following reasons. () We cannot possibly entertain fo high an opinion of Mr. M's abilities, as to suppose him qualified for making an improvement in our Liturgy, when we confider it as the production of men of the deepest learning and piety, whose exemplary holiness in life, and invincible fortitude in death, proved them to have been amply qualified for the high office of Reformers, and to have been eminently worthy of the crown of Martyrs. (2) Our liturgy does not really need any addition. It is already full, and includes every fingle article of moment, which a poor sinner can wish to form in his addresses to the throne of grace. It is comprehensive, without being prolix; explanatory, without being tedious; and concife, without being obscure. It stands in our fervice as a firm barrier against the incroach-

ments of herefy; as an excellent model for congregational prayer; and as a prefervative against the introduction of men's private opinions into that part of divine worship, which ought certainly to be the most folemn, the most pure, and the most scriptural of any other. How often have 1 bleffed God for our judicious Liturgy, when I have been ear-witness to the irreverence, and vain repetition, wherewith extemporaneous effusions in prayer, too often abound! And how has it grieved me to observe the great influence of prejudice! which, fooner than be obligated to the establishment for a liturgical fervice, will fometimes palm upon a congregation absolute nonsense, or perhaps fomething worfe. (3) The petition proposed, is virtually contained in the following suffrages. "From pride, vain-glory, and hypocrify. " - from all the deceits of the world, the flesh, " and the devil, good LORD deliver us!" I dare fay, I need not inform you, Sir, that false joy, false confidence, false hope, and false faith too, are the inseparable concomitants of pride, vainglory, and hypocrify; and as the devil can fo far transform himself into an angel of light, as to recommend, and fuccessfully inspire, all these four dreadful falfities into the hearts of finners, from which our Church prays to be delivered; I hope you are now convinced that your lately-proposed reformation in our liturgy, is fuperfluous, redundant and unnecessary.

g I was for some time at a loss to conceive what connection cou'd possibly subfist between your ceremony of dipping, and the introduction of your additional petition into our Liturgy. But my conjectural difficulties foon vanished, upon being informed, that in your fermon preparatory to plunging the adults, you expatiated on the interview between Philip and the Eunuch. mentioned in Acts viii. 26-40. One circumstance which you feem especially to have dwelt upon, was that of the happy Æthiopian "going on his way " rejoicing." This, I suppose, led you to confider the nature of true and false joy; and from thence you were inclined probably to propose an amendment in our Liturgy. But furely, Sir, you cannot think that the Eunuch's joy was the truer because he was baptized; or that it was founded upon that circumstance. I believe his joy was antecedent to his being baptized, and that it had an entire reference to that crucified Fesus whom Paul preached, and in whom he believed. Had the Eunuch rejoiced merely because his body was wathed in water, fuch rejoicing wou'd have characterized him, as belonging to the concision; and not to that true circumcision, whose "rejoicing is " in Christ Jesus, and who put no confidence in "the flesh." Phil. iii. 2. For, whoever makes any thing, either in whole or in part, the ground of his rejoicing before God, fave the atonement and obedience of Christ, does so far rest in a creature-work, and derogate from the Redeemer's glory. And yet, if your whole exhortation did did not wear some such legal aspect, I cannot conceive wherefore you animadverted on the supposed desectiveness of our Liturgy; when such animadversion tended to infinuate, that the dispensers of Infant-Baptism, and the persons so baptized, must be under the influence of a false joy.

Although I am willing to hope, that, whatever you may have dropped on this subject, arose, more from inaccuracy of expression, than real error of fentiment; yet, lest your spirit shou'd have been particularly legalized upon a favorite occasion, permit me to state the following case. — Suppose any of the candidates for immertion (for it feems they were dreffed in white) shou'd turn out to have been hypocrites, or formal profesfors; that they were utterly unacquainted with the found faith of the converted Eunuch; and that they went to the bath, with the same stupid spirit, in which numbers approach the facrament; wou'd their "watery grave, "" ex opere operato bury their fins, or make them partakers of the true laver of regeneration? If they rejoiced; wou'd their joy be that with which a stranger intermeddleth not? Wou'd not it be joy in hely water, rather than in the Hely Ghost? Wou'd it not be a joy in dipping, and not in believing? And, confequently, wou'd it not be the delufive joy of the hypocrite, or the flashy joy of the stony-ground hearer? And if this may have been the cafe with fome, as it certainly may; was your exhortation calculated to rouse them from their dream? Rather, by making an illtimed digreffion to the supposed defects of the effablished effablished Liturgy, and to those ministers, who are advocates for Infant-Baptism, had it not a tendency to inspire your candidates with an improper contempt of both; to puss them up with self-conceit; and to make them (Pharisee-like) "thank God, that they were not like other" un-

by afpersion or sprinkling, several of your hearers thought you more amusing than judicious. Whole vollies of low witticisms were levelled, it seems, at the ministers in the establishment and among the differences, who do not choose to lay such a stress on dipping, as you do. But perhaps all these witticisms put together (if I may judge of the whole by a part) did not carry with them the cogency of one solid observation; and I am persuaded the whole of such risible ordinance would be mere brutum fulmen, harmless artillery, when opposed to a single scriptural argument. However, let us try the strength of a few of them.

In order that you might ridicule those who do not dispense baptism by immersion, you wint'ly observed, "that they only baptize the ends of "their fingers." This observation savors more of vulgarity than solidity. The error contained in it, is founded on a mere begging the question. You take for granted, that baptism always signifies dipping; or that the idea of the one is always inseparably connected with that of the other. But a proper attention to the analogy of scripture, and a moderate acquaintance with the genius of the greek language wou'd convince you of your mistake. (1) By comparing a few passages of fcripture together, it will appear, that the Holy Ghost uses the terms baptizing, sprinkling, pouring out, &c. as synonymous. Thus when the prophet fays, "He shall SPRINKLE many nations," Isa. lii. 15. the fon of Zacharias faith, " He shall " BAPTIZE you with the Holy Ghost and with " fire." Mat. iii. 11. The influence of the Spirit is frequently represented under the symbol of the element used in baptism. Hence that glorious promife, "Then will I SPRINKLE clean " water upon you, and ye shall be clean, &c." Ezek. xxxvi. 25. And hence the correspondent promise under the New Testament, " He that believeth and is BAPTIZED shall be faved." Mark xvi. 16. Again, the baptism of the Holy Ghost is promised in that remarkable prophecy of foel in the following terms. " It shall come to " pass afterwards that I will POUR OUT my "Spirit upon all flesh." This very promise, which was fo eminently fulfilled upon the day of Pentecost, the Apostle Peter quoted in the course of his fermon recorded in Acts ii. and moreover uses the very word of the prophet, faying, "He " hath shed forth (the Greek word is itexts poured " out) this, which ye now fee and hear." And yet this shedding forth or pouring out is called baptizing. Yea I can prove that falling upon and baptizing are used synonymously in scripture.

In Peter's famous contest at Jerusalem with the legal advocates for circumcifion he recites the particulars of his vision, the removal of his jewith prejudices, and the manner in which the Gentiles were confirmed in the bleffings of the covenant. " As I began to fpeak" fays the Apostle, " the " Holy Ghost FELL ON imement them, as on us, " &c. Then remembered I the word of the " LORD, how that he faid, ye shall be BAP-"TIZED with the Holy Ghost." Acts ii. 15, 16. From all these correspondent passages, it must appear to every unprejudiced person, that the gift of the Spirit of God is illustrated by the terms sprinkling, pouring out, &c. that these terms are equivalent to baptizing; and that as the baptifmal water is an emblem of the Spirit of Christ, I am fully perfuaded, when the facramentary element is either poured or sprinkled upon an infant in the name of the TRI-UNE GOD, it is as effectually baptized, as if it were plunged twenty fathom under water. (2) The various use of the Greek word εαπτιζω might convince you, that the idea of dipping is not effentially connected with it. I will therefore quote a few passages, where it has a different acceptation. For, (as the judicious Leight observes in his Critica sacra) "though the word" " baptize be derived from Gamew mergo or tingo, to " dip or plunge into water, yet it is taken more " largely for any kind of washing, rinsing, or " cleanfing, even where there is no dipping at all," at least no plunging of the whole body under water.

ter. - The Evangelist informs us that the Pharifees, " except they wash (Cantiswila, baptize them-" felves) eat not." Here was in this custom no immerging of the whole body; because to do this, every time they came from market, wou'd have been extremely inconvenient, and in many cases impracticable: besides the Apostle says that they wathed their hands. Yea that they held the "wash-" ing (Ganlious, baptisms) of cups, and pots, brazen vessels, and of (xxxxxx couches) tables. Mark vii. 4. If any will contend that the Pharifees put their cups and pots under water, in order to clean them, yet furely it wou'd be abfurd to suppose that they immerged their couches too. Probably these were sprinkled; and yet the mode of cleanfing them is called baptism. A clear proof that the greek word has the different acceptation I contend for; that a person may be faid to be baptized, when only a part of his body is cleanfed with water; and that a manner of cleanfing is in fcripture called a baptism, even where there is no dipping at all .- Our Saviour faith, "I have a baptism to be " baptized with, &c." Luke xii. 50. The baptism alluded to, was that of his blood. But, wou'd it not be extremely abfurd to fay that Christ was dipped in his blood? Rather, as we are informed that in his agony, great drops were forced from the Redeemer's tortured pores, and fell in grumous clots to the ground; does not fuch a bloody baptism naturally suggest the idea of sprinkling? Especially since the Redeemer himself, upon his great great work of treading the wine-press, and vanquishing his enemies, is introduced by the prophet, as faying, "Their blood shall be SPRIN-" KLED upon my garments." Isa. lxiii. 3.—John prophesied of Christ, saying, "He shall baptize " you with the Holy Ghost." Luke iii. 16. Is the least idea of dipping connected with this promise? or with it's fulfilment? when it is faid, that the Spirit of God in the form of fiery tongues fat upon the Apostles. Acts ii. 3. Yet this sitting upon is called a being baptized, which furely is as remotefrom the idea of dipping, as from that of flying. Again, the Apostle says that "the fathers were baptized in the cloud and in the fea." i. Cor. x. 2. They "were under the cloud," that is, the cloud went over them like a canopy or umbrella, but without touching. So that if they were baptized in it, this must be attributed to the drops which fell from it, and sprinkled them. They " passed " thro' the fea," which baptized them in the same manner. As the watery element flood like a wall upon the right hand and upon the left, detached particles driven by the wind lightly sprinkled the marching tribes. So that, while the Ifraelites were baptized by sprinkling, Pharaoh's host, which purfued them, were baptized by immersion with a vengeance; for the fea, hitherto parted for Ifrael's . fafe conveyance, fell in upon the purfuers, fo that they funk, (or, if you please, were dipped) like lead in the mighty waters. — The Author of the epiftle to the Hebrews fays, that the " first " covenant" C 2

" covenant" or dispensation of Moses " had di-" vers washings," մաφοςοις Carlispois different baptisms. Heb. ix. 10. Let any person but attentively read the account of these ablutions, wathings, or bapti/ms, under the law, and he will find that they were frequently executed by sprinkling. The case of the leper is remarkable. "Then the priest " thall SPRINKLE upon him that is to be " cleanfed," &c. Lev. xiv. 7. And the Apostle ascribes a legal purification of the unclean to the sprinkling of the blood of bulls and goats, and to the ashes of an heiser. Heb. ix. 13. From hence it is manifest that the Holy Ghost in his word, calls sprinklings, baptisms, and vice versa; and that, to attribute the idea of dipping to the word baptize, is, to misinterpret the oracles of God, to fet scripture against itself—to be wise above that which is written — and groffly to overlook the real import of the original, merely for establishing a favorite but unimportant ceremony,

7 But perhaps, notwithstanding the various acceptations of the word baptism, you still conclude, that all who were admitted to that ordinance, were absolutely dippea. And you think that the instances recorded in the New Testament, prove the point. But, although I am not reluctant in acknowledging, that baptism may have been fometimes administered by immersion; yet, that this was not always the case, there is, I think, evident intimation. And if you had considered this point more maturely, I am certain you wou'd not have delivered yourfelf to peremptorily upon the subject.

(1) Do you think, Sir, that the vast multitude mentioned in Mat. iii. 5. were all dipped? For it is written, "Then went out to him gerusalem, " and all Judea, and all the region round about " fordan, and were baptized of him in fordan, " confessing their fins." I am so fully satisfied with Mr. Wesley's observations on this text; and they express my own fentiments fo much better than I cou'd myself; that, for your sake, and for. that of the candid reader, I will transcribe them intire, as they fland in his Notes on the New Testament. "Such prodigious numbers cou'd " hardly be baptized by immerging their whole " bodies under water: nor can we think they " were provided with change of raiment for it, " which was scarce practicable for such vast mul-" titudes. And yet they cou'd not be immerged " naked with MODESTY; nor in their wearing. "apparel with SAFETY. It feems therefore, " that they flood in ranks on the edge of the " river; and that John, passing along before them. " cast water on their heads or faces; by which " means he might baptize many thousands in a " day. And this way most naturally fignified " Christ's baptizing them, with the Holy Ghost and " with fire, which John spoke of, as prefigured " by his baptizing with water; and which was " eminently fulfilled, when the Holy Ghost sat 55 upon the disciples in the appearance of tongues, f' or flames of fire." (2) By

(2) By means of the extraordinary fermons delivered by Peter on the day of Pentecost, we are informed that no lefs than "three thousand souls were added unto the church that very day; " who having gladly received his word were " baptized." Acts ii. 41. Now I appeal to common fense, whether it is reasonable to suppose' that this prodigious number of converts cou'd' have been dipped; when fuch a circumstance must have been attended with insuperable inconveniencies to the persons baptized; and, (if practicable) must have required the attendance of the Apostles not only for one day, but for many days, and weeks too. And yet that they were baptized the fame day they were awakened, feems plain from the style of the Evangelist, "Then, TOTE at that time, they that received the word were " baptized." Supposing then that the ordinance was differented by pouring or sprinkling of water, and not by dipping, even the three thousand might have been thus as eafily and commodiously baptized at one time, as five thousand were fed upon another occasion. But, upon any other suppofition, it feems improbable and abfurd.

(3) Even the history of the Eunuch's conversion does not furnish any absolute proof of his having been baptized by immersion. Indeed the contrary is supposable. For, as the Eunuch cou'd not have been prepared for an unexpected plunge under water; it is unnatural to suppose that Philip sent him away dripping wet, as he had a journey to purfue; especially as such a circumstance might inspire the Eunuch with an unsavorable idea of christianity, just at his first setting out.

—— As to the manner in which the jailor was baptized, I think it seems more than probable, it cou'd not have been by dipping; since the place (a dungeon,) the time (midnight,) and other concomitant circumstances, must have rendered immersion incommodious and even impossible; unless you adopt an absurd and improbable supposition that the jailor was provided with a baptistery in his house.

(4) However even supposing that in hot countries and upon particular occasions, baptism was administered by immersion; yet this is no proof that this was always the case; for even Scripture itself abundantly intimates the contrary, and so does the usage of the Church for many centuries back, as well as that of the most pure and slourishing protestant Churches in the present day.

In certain circumstances and upon some particular occasions, dipping wou'd be not only impracticable, but likewise attended with considerable danger.— For instance. Suppose, Sir, that you were called to visit the fick-bed of an abandoned insidel, a carnal Jew, or a deluded Quaker; that any one of these three avowed enemies to the christian facraments was happily convinced of his errors through your instrumentality; and that upon the removal of his prejudices against the gospel of the blessed God, he requested you to admit him to the New Testament seal of the eovenants Wou'd you, as a dispenser of baptisin, insist, that the party, laboring under an acute diforder, racked with pain, and perhaps just launching into eternity, thou'd be taken out of bed, and plunged head-over-ears in a bath? Or in fuch circumstances, wou'd not humanity, scripture, and unavoidable necessity fo far overcome your ceremonial prejudices, as to fuggest the propriety of administering the baptifinal water by sprinkling, or pouring? And as fuch a circumstance may often occur, in your visits to fick people; must you not, either, omit altogether what you fay is " ef-" fential to the obedience of faith?" (which upon your principle must be an essential omission,) or else do that, which might accelerate their departure out of the world? or be driven to the humane necessity of sprinkling some of your dying converts? Or, suppose that a woman, far advanced in her pregnancy, shou'd happen to be one of your candidates; wou'd not tenderness for the peculiar circumstances of the mother and the unborn infant, (not to fay decency,) fuggest the postponing an unimportant ceremony, which might turn out " a " watery grave" with a witness, to both parties? especially if the immersion shou'd take place in the rigorous feafon of winter? Wou'd not therefore sprinkling, in this case, be more proper, and every whit as efficacious? "O but we might do it in " faith." Nay, you shou'd rather have said, "in " presumption," for I believe faith has nothing to do with the matter. However if immersion in such dangerous circumstances be done in faith; why might it not be delayed in faith? I am certain, that, even in case of death, such a procrastination wou'd not in the least affect the eternal welfare of either mother or child; since it is promised, "She shall be saved in child-bearing (not if she is dipped) but if they continue in faith and love, and holiness with sobriety." i. Tim. ii. 15.

Confidering then that the nature of a climate, the feafon of the year, the peculiar fituation of fick persons, and of pregnant women, and various other circumstances might concur to render dipping, extremely abfurd, dangerous, and even cruel; I say considering this, I am much surprifed, Sir, to hear that in one of your inconclusive and unbecoming illustrations, you asked your audience, whether " if the sprinkling of their of pots, cups, &c. wou'd cleanse them." This was defigned as another vulgar reflection upon the ininisters in the establishment and among the diffenters. A judicious friend of mine, who heard and fmiled at the weakness of this coarse fimilitude, observed, that " if the pots or cups were " to be wrapt in cloths, and drawn fuddenly thro' " the water, they wou'd not be a whit cleaner " by fuch an operation, than if they were fprin-" kled." This was a fmart reply, and in your own ftyle too, Sir, I shall leave the proper application of it to yourself, and the immerged candidates. 2 I won-

8 I wonder, dear Sir, you wou'd drop fuch low hints about the cleanfing quality of immersion. Is it not possible, that sometimes in one of your zealous paroxysms upon this favorite subject, you may forget the important observation of the Apostle. "Baptism doth now fave us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward Gop!)"i. Pet. iii. 21. Lest you shou'd overlook the point of moment in this text, permit me to fuggest a little paraphrase upon it. The conscience is rendered good, when it is sprinkled from the evil of guilt, and the fense of condemnation, by the blood of Christ, and when "it is purged from dead works to ferve the " living God." Heb. ix. 14. - x. 22. Here is a two-fold work of purification which must pass upon a guilty conscience and a polluted heart; and which is effected thro' the powerful efficacy of the blood of sprinkling. The removal of guilt from the one, and the fanctification of the other, are fymbolically represented in the ordinance of baptism; wherein the element of water operates on the body, as the blood and Spirit of Christ do upon the immortal foul. Here then we are prefented with the harmonious and fignificant coagency of the "Three that bear witness on earth." i. John, v. 8. the sprinkling of the BLOOD of Christ in justification, the sprinkling of the SPIRIT of Christ in fanctification, and the sprinkling of the baptismal water in fealing those blessings on the heart and conscience. These "three agree 66 in

" in one" and the same uniform testimony to the work, offices, and person of HIM who "came " by water and blood," - in one and the fame glorious co-operation in the falvation of finners and in one and the same indissoluble connection between Christ, his blood, his Spirit, his facraments, his gospel, his ministers, his people. The water in baptism only puts away the filth of the flesh; but the Spirit and blood remove the pollution of the fout. The former operates dependently upon and in fubordination to the co-efficiency of the latter; without which, all the pouring, fprinkling, or dipping in the world, cannot purge

When therefore you urge immersion, wou'd it not be much more to the purpose, if you wou'd expatiate upon the purifying virtue of the Redeemer's blood and Spirit, instead of laying such an emphasis on your favorite mode of baptizing? Wou'd it not tend to the awakening and undeceiving your candidates, rather to press on them the important necessity of the answer of a good conscience toward God, than to amuse them with humorous illustrations, which are fo apt to divert the mind from the grand point? And, inflead of proposing any fimilitudes, which wou'd infinuate, that baptifmal water in immersion, cleanses better than by pouring or sprinkling; wou'd it not be more conducive to edification, more confiftent with your important function, and more evangelical, to preach that one effential baptism of the D 2 Holy Holy Ghost, without which we can never enter heaven whether we be sprinkled or dipped?

9 You observe, Sir, I am fond of using the term sprinkling, and for no other reason, but because it is the favorite phraseology of the Holy Ghost in his word. "Moses took the blood of calves and " of goats with water, and SPRINKLED both the book and all the people. He SPRINKLED " likewife the tabernacle, and all the veffels of the ministry." Heb. ix. 19. 21. Now, Sir, can you possibly entertain a doubt, whether the people and the veffels were as effectually cleanfed by sprinkling, as if both the one and the other had been dipped in a baptistery of blood? If fuch a doubt shou'd remain, the Apostle I hope will remove it. " Al-" most all things are by the law purged, xa9agigera: " purified, cleanfed by the (fprinkling of) blood." Heb. ix. 22. So that, if both persons and vessels might be faid to have been legally purified or -baptized by sprinkling, under the law; is it not rational and scriptural to appropriate the term, and to adopt the mode, under the gospel? And does not your fimilitude confequently fall to the ground? which infinuates that "a veffel cannot " be legally cleansed, unless it be dipt, or that a " person may not be evangelically purified, un-" lefs his whole body be immerged in the facramen-"tary element." Befides; does not the very mode of administering circumcision refute this idea? That ordinance reprefented the mortification of the heart to fin, the feal of the covenant, and the . 2 cutting cutting-off of every carnal superfluity connected with corrupt slesh and blood. Though it manifestly implied a death of the whole man to sin, and a consecration of the whole heart to God, it was nevertheless applied to but a small part of the body. Yet, who will dare say that it was not therefore effectual? Why indeed, according to the ideas of a baptist, who seems to make the effence of a facrament to consist in its application to the whole body, circumcision ought to have been dispensed by an universal excoriation. *

10 The Apostle records that Moses by faith " kept the paffover and the sprinkling of blood." Heb. xi. 28. The greek word is meogyvou affusion. or pouring to, which our translators very properly render sprinkling; because as a bunch of hyssop was the inftrument used in applying the blood of the paschal lamb, it must have been consequently sprinkled. The instituted means then of Israel's deliverance from the destroying angel was the blood of the paffover; the manner of application was by fprinkling; and the falvation effected was. not thro' the quantity, but the quality of the pafchal blood; one drop of which upon an Israelite's door, wou'd have been as efficacious a preservative, as if both the house and houshold had been dipt in blood. If then, sprinkling was upon this important occasion, an effectual and fignificant fign; why may it not be equally fo under the present dispensation? Can not the salvation of the

Son

Son of God be as really sealed in the sprinkling of a little baptismal water, now, as a temporal salvation was of old thro' the sprinkling of a little blood?

I hope, dear Sir, by this time, your prejudices against the word sprinkling, and the mode it implies, are in some small degree dropt; especially, as both the one and the other have the fanction of the Holy Ghost himself. I cou'd wish, that you and all your baptist-brethren, instead of laying fuch a legal stress on going under water. wou'd exhauft all your arguments and exhortations in pointing your hearers to the fountain of Immanuel's blood, which alone can wash the filthy Æthiop white; and to that true " washing " of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghoff," without which, whofoever liveth, is counted dead before God. Lest some of your candidates for dipping shou'd go down to their " watery grave," and at last to the grave of death, with "a type in their right hand;" tell them, O tell them, Sir, that not all the water in Fordan can wash away their innate pollution; and that

No outward forms can make them clean, The LEPROSY lies deep within.

Instead of ridiculing your brethren, who think they have scriptural authority for differing from you on the unimportant subject of dipping, learn at least to speak tenderly of them, if you think they do not deserve an honorable mention. For whatever you may think of many of those, who are not of the church, (as you call your feet) I am fully perfuaded, and I hope in your cooler moments you yourfelf will acknowledge) they are "the angels of the churches and the glory of "Christ."—Instead of exciting the contempt of your hearers for the established church, by taking a detached portion of her service, and making it the object of an ungenerous sneer; strive to treat our venerable Alma Mater with some degree of delicacy and decorum: for you know in your conscience, that her dostrinal system is built upon the soundation of the Apostles and Prophets; and that your own dissent from her, is rather a dissent of discipline and non-essentials, than of doctrine and essentials.

I shou'd now take my leave of you, Sir, but that I have considered only one half of the subject which induced me to take up my pen. And, as that which remains is a point of great importance, I shou'd certainly do great injustice to my readers, to my subject, to myself, and to you, Sir, if I passed it over un-noticed. — I have already endeavored to prove from scripture, reason, and satisfy that dipping is by no means essential to the mode of dispensing baptism — that the greek word carris has not the limited signification, which baptists

[†] That, baptizing by immersion was often dispensed with in cases of unavoidable necessity, and even in hot countries, is plain, from what Gornelius Bishop of Rome, Anno Dom. 251, says concerning Novatian, " is assume a same of execution of sexual management of the was baptized by affusion, or sprinkling, in the bed in which he lay."

baptists wou'd affix to it; but that it includes the ideas of pouring-out, rinsing, sprinkling and washing in general—that the observations you lately made on the subject, were unfolid and unargumentative—and that your manner of animadverting on those churches which differ from you, was, in the estimation of many of your judicious hearers, indelicate, un-catholic, and severe. But, I proceed now to consider some of your strictures

Cyprian. The opinion of this venerable father had been asked, whether one in the communion of the church, having been partaker of clynic baptism, or baptism in bed, ought to be re-baptized. To this he answers, "You inquire, what I think of fuch as obtain the grace (of baptism) in time of their sickness and infirmity; whether they are to be accounted lawful (lawfully baptized) christians, because they are not washed all over, with the water of falvation, but have only some of it poured on them. I judge thus; that the divine favors are not maimed or weakened, fo that any thing less than the whole of them is conveyed; for the contagion of fin is not in the facrament washed off by the same measures, that the dirt of the skin and of the body is washed off in an ordinary bath: so as that there shou'd be any necessity of foap, and a large fish-pond or pool. In the factaments, when necessity compels, the shortest ways of transacting the divine matters, do by Gon's gracious dispensation, confer the WHOLE BENEFIT. And no man need therefore think otherwife, because these sick people, when they receive the grace of our LORD, have nothing but an affusion or sprinkling; as the holy fcripture by the prophet Ezeliel fays, I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and you Shall be clean, &c. - Therefore, if any one think that they obtain no benefit as having only an affusion of the water of salvation; don't let him mistake so far, as that the parties if they recover of their sickness shou'd be bapfized again." - The great Dr. Whitaker fays, " In the case of infants, and of fickly people, I think sprinkling sufficient." ---And our great reformer Wickliff fays, in Trialog. 1. iv. c. 11. "It is not material whether they be dipped, once, or thrice, or water be poured on their heads." See Wall's History of Infant-Baptism.

on infant-baptism, and to vindicate that new-testament sign and seal of the covenant from the prejudices, opposition, and misrepresentation of anabaptism.

II. The grand point which the reformed churches contend for, in their opposition to anabaptism is, the admission of infants into the visible church by the ordinance of baptism; which is both a sign and seal of the blessings of the covenant, and is a manifest succedaneum to the old-testament rite of circumcision. The children of God's Israel were taken into covenant with him under the law; and we maintain that this privilege is by no means lost under the gospel-dispensation, but is still continued to the visible church, by the institution of infant-baptism.

This the Baptists have always denied; and they not only do not baptize their own children, but likewife rebaptize all their profelytes, though they may have been baptized before in their infancy. This latter circumstance has deservedly procured for them the name of Anabaptists, or rebaptizers; though they do not choose to embrace this appellation themselves, because they wou'd infinuate that infant-baptism is no baptism at all.

By rejecting this fignificant gospel rite, they mutilate the new-testament church in one of her important facraments; they deprive the children of believing parents of a privilege, which they enjoyed under the difpensation of Moses, and which God never took from them under that of Christ; and, by pressing adult-immersion with bigoted zeal on those who were baptized in infancy, they have greatly annoyed the peace of the resormed churches, and embarrassed the minds of the simple and unestablished.

Whatever other advantages the Anabaptists may have on their fide, they certainly have not that of antiquity, * for we hear nothing confiderable of them till about the year 1517. Their origin was mean; their principles were corrupt; their morals depraved; and their diffent from the reformed) churches, was then deemed heretical. Besides the vitious tendency of their principles, and the feandalous nature of their lives, they were fanatics + in the highest degree. They preached up an absolute freedom from all subjection to the civil power; which, by an act of enthusiasin and rebellion, they labored to monopolize themselves. They affected to establish a spiritual regency, like the mad Fifth-Monarchy-men in Charles the fecond's reign. And the king of this new Jerusalem was ^{*} Good Mr. Philpot, who flourished and was martyred during the bloody anspices of Queen Mary, in a letter to a sellow-prisoner of his on the subject of infant-baptism, says, "The verity of antiquity is on our side; and the Anabaptists have nothing but tyes," for them and new imaginations; which feign the baptism of children to be a Pope's commandment." Wall's history, one John of Leyden. This mad ring-leader, at the head of his ranting feet, feized on Munster a town in Germany; where he was killed in the midst of his foolish usurpation, and his feet dispersed in the year 1536. From this time they seem to have been cured of their civil pretensions, but still retained their religious peculiarities respecting adultimmersion.

The Anabaptists made their appearance in Germany a little after the remarkable period of Luther's reformation. As their fentiments and conduct attracted his attention, the impiety of both received many a severe scourge from the tongue and pen of that great reformer. In his epistle to the Galatians, he paints their enormities in the most hideous, yet true colors; and gives them such a chastisement as their cause deserved.

Calvin is next upon the list of those, who encountered the Anabaptists, and detected the fallacious tendency of their errors. In his Institutes, he considers all the parts of the controversy relative to infant-baptism, and, in the most argumentative and scriptural manner, pursues anabaptism thro' all those low subterfuges and pitiful evasions, under which it has ever been obliged to screen itself from the vigorous attacks of scripture and reason; especially when these weapons have been brandished by such champions for truth, as Luther and Calvin.

A cotemporary of Calvin, and a fiery zealot on the subject of adult-baptism, was one Servetus.

E 2 This

This unhappy man, who was a peft to the church of Geneva, took up weapons in defence of the cause of the Anabaptists, and (as Calvin faith in his Infitutes) " was the great glory of that company"; (a glory, by the bye, which anabaptism, whether ancient or modern, has no reason to be very proud of) Servetus, in mustering all his logical forces, contrived to glean together twenty arguments, fuch as they are; which he levelled against the opinion of the reformed churches on the right of infant-baptism. These twenty arguments, (or rather, vile fophisms) Calvin enumerates, attacks, and refutes; and closes his refutation of the Sophister's quibbles, by faying, "I trust I have now proved with what feeble fuccours Servetus hath holpen " his filly brethren the Anabaptists."

Among the modern advocates for the new-testament ordinance of infant-baptism, I know none superior, and very sew equal to Mr. Bostwick. This excellent writer was Minister of the presbyterian church in New York, and died, in the midst of great usefulness, in the year 1763, and only in the 44th year of his age. Some perplexities among his slock, occasioned by the intrusion of anabaptism, obliged him to defend the right of infant-baptism, in several masterly discourses, delivered to his congregation on that subject. These discourses are abridged, and united. The main arguments are adduced; and, being methodically arranged, exhibit, in a small compass, a firm battery of scripture and reason, which bids desiance to the attacks of all the Anabaptists in the world. The style of Mr. Bostwick's vindication is nervous and elegant; his method, extremely perspicuous and concise; and his arguments are deep, weighty, and conclusive.

I have produced this little sketch, respecting the rife, progress, and opposition of the German Anabaptists, not in order to compare them with their brethren of that denomination in this kingdom. I rather rejoice in having an opportunity of exhibiting fuch a striking contrast. For, the only likeness I can trace between the parents and their children, consists but in one point; the unlikeness, in many particulars. The former were rebels, enthufiafts, ranters, antinomians; but the latter are peaceable fubjects; many of them are found, orthodox christians; and in general, the Anabaptists in this kingdom conflitute a very respectable body of protestant-dissenters. The only feature wherein modern Anabaptists feem to refemble their German ancestors, confists, in their strong attachment to adult-baptism. What a pity, when the vessel had been purged from the putrid mixture of rebellion, ranterism, and impiety, that it was not also purified from the foul taint of a facramental error, and the four dregs of party-bigotry! Then the resemblance between German and English anabaptism, wou'd have intirely ceased. But I forget the poet's observation;

Quo semel est imbuta recens, servabit odorem Testa Div.

Though you may have thought me tedious in producing this little sketch from church-history, concerning the origin of your German brethren; yet, I prefume you will not deem me impertinent in fo doing, fince fuch a circumstance shews, that anabaptism has been opposed by some of the brightest ornaments in the church of Christ; and that those, who first rejected infant-baptism, were the vilest of men, and therefore very unlikely to have been under the guidance of the Spirit of truth. And, though I verily believe many of the modern Anabaptists are spiritually-minded men; yet, methinks, the fource, from whence they have derived their peculiar fentiment, ought to excite fufpicions that it is not of fcriptural and primitive authenticity.

I am fully perfuaded, that the matter in debate is not of an indifferent nature; and therefore that every circumstance, which points out the novelty and evil tendency of original anabaptism, serves to throw light on the nature of the present subject. "If infant-baptism be a meer nullity (says Mr. Bostwick) as some pretend; then we, together with the generality of the protestant churches, are, in sact, a company of unbaptized heathens; who have neither churches, ministers, nor ordinances, according to the institution of Fesus Christ. And although it must be allowed, that there are, and always have been, vastly more truly-religious people, who have been baptized in insancy, than others; yet, all who have been so baptized, are, on these principles (of the anabaptists) out of the visible church; and the consequence will be, that greater numbers are saved out of the church, than in it; which is very absurd, to say nothing worse." — Again, "If insant-baptism be a divine institution, then, they who consent to be baptized in their adult age, do, in that transaction necessarily renounce a divine institution, and an ordinance of fesus Christ; and, as it were, vacate the former seal of the covenant between God and them; they practically say, there are no baptized persons, no regular ministers, nor ordinances, in all the numerous professing churches, but their own."

Confidering then, that fuch important evils refult from a reception of your peculiar tenet; that it has been ever opposed by the reformed churches; that fome of truth's brighest ornaments have made it matter of earnest debate; and that the church of which I have the happiness to be a member, manifestly rejects it as an error; I flatter myself, you will not think it unreasonable or prepofterous in me to fland forth in defence of that very facrament, by which I myself was made an initiated "member of CHRIST's" visible church "a child of God" by an external covenanted relation, and " an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven" or a possessor of the privileges of that gospel-kingdom, which John the Baptist pointed to, when he faid, "the kingdom of heaven is at hand", and to which CHRIST himself referred, faying, "Of fuch (little children) is the kingdom of heaven"; of which privileges, baptism, the seal of the covenant, is surely not the least.

But notwithstanding the voice of antiquity, and the usage of all the reformed churches in favor of infant-baptism, you still think scripture is on your fide. If that can be proved, it must be acknowledged that fuch divine fanction ought to turn the ballance, and outweigh all the most venerable human authority. But, we, on the other hand, are convinced that scripture is our friend, and are therefore willing to rest the matter on the decisions of that infallible judge. Let me however, whisper into your ear, a hint of no inconsiderable moment; and that is, if the baptizing of infants can, by an uninterrupted and authentic chain of church-history, be traced (as it most undeniably can) even to the cotemporaries of the apostles and some of their most eminent disciples; then furely, fuch a circumflance makes more strongly for us, then a retrospect to the German Ranters can for the present Anabaptists. However, let us fee how you defend the point from scripture.

I I find it is customary with baptist-ministers, to preach a sermon, suitable and preparatory to dipping; which sermon is generally sounded upon some apposite portion of scripture. This, it seems, you did in this town; and chose for your text i. Pet. ii. 21. "Leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps."-What your audience in general may have thought respecting the fuitableness of this text, I cannot tell. I will however venture to affirm, Sir, that you were rather unfortunate in your choice. My Bible is now before me; and, while I am attentively examining the context, and carefully perufing the whole chapter; to my affonishment, I cannot find the finallest trace of that subject, which you thought proper to establish on the words of the apostle. The chapter is introduced with an exhortation to the new-born babes in CHRIST, to lay aside certain abominable tempers, which might vitiate their tafte for the unadulterated milk of the word - to come to CHRIST as to a living stone, that they might be built up, in their most holy saith, a spiritual house, &c.—their peculiar privileges, dignity, obligation to holiness, &c. are represented under the titles of "chosen generation, royal priest-" wood, &c." - they are exhorted to abstain from fleshly lusts, and to have their conversation, honest among the gentiles—not to be petulant to the higher powers, but quietly to submit to every ordinance of man, for the LORD's fake - to live as the free-men of CHRIST; but not so to abuse that liberty as to make it a religious cloke for maliciousness—to honour all men, by a calm, loving, respectful deportment—relative duties are enforced - and then, the context exhibits CHRIST as the fpotless example of universal obedience; of

To these heavenly tempers, which are of more worth than the gold of Ophir, and of greater importance in real christianity than ten thousand dippings of the body, believers are called; and to these the apostle exhorts them by proposing to their imitation the immaculate obedience of the bleffed Jesus. But is there here the smallest reference made to adult-immersion? The wife apostle dwells intirely upon what he himself calls "the answer of a good conscience towards GoD;" but drops not a fingle hint about " putting " away the filth of the flesh." And yet, if he thought as you do, that "adult-dipping is effen-"tial to the obedience of faith;" I appeal to your own fense and candor, whether the apostle wou'd have omitted it in his catalogue of imitabilia* in the life of CHRIST; and whether fuch omission does not imply, that, so far from constituting an essential part of the obedience of faith, it deserves to be ranked among the nonessentials?

2 To be explicit with you, Sir; I by no means approve of a method adopted by many preachers in their public harangues; which confifts in making choice of a text, that perhaps is as remote from their subject, as the east is from the west. This incoherent mode of preaching is suggested often by ignorance, or bigotry; and not feldom, by contemptible vanity. And, although an injudicious audience mightapplaud fuch incoherency, and greatly admirethe preacher, while he strains every nerve, in order to display his great abilities; yet I am convinced fuch preaching feldom tends to edification. If indeed, it was adopted, merely to illustrate a favorite tenet, the abfurdity wou'd not be fo great. But, when it is used, with an intent to establish, and to demonstrate, it then becomes not only highly abfurd, but extremely dangerous too. By fuch a mode, a man might graft on God's word, the most egregious nonfense, the most horrid blasphemy, or the most damnable herefy. An instance of the first of these three evils, I remember to have heard of, in an ignorant, bigoted Secedor; who would infift, that the parchments, which Paul left at Troas, and about which he was fo anxious, must have been "the foolamn lague aund coov'nant." *

3 But you still think, that your text sufficiently warranted your applying it to Christ's baptism; and, taking it for granted that he was immerged by John the Baptist, you therefore proposed the Redeemer as an example to be followed in adult-baptism, as well as in every thing else. But, according to this mode of extending and applying scripture, you might have proposed Christ as an example for many things, utterly impracticable, and grossly absurd. For instance; according to this rule, we ought never to be baptized, till we have arrived at the age of 30 years; no where, but in Jordan, and by none, but John, the fon of Zacharias. The first of these absurd punctilios, Servetus literally insisted upon; enjoining the 30th year as the only proper time for baptism, though (as Calvin says of this blundering Anabaptist) "when he stiffly required this time in others, yet he began at the 21st year of his age to boast himself to be a prophet: hereby assuming to himself the office of a teacher, before he could (upon his own principle) be a member of the church."

4 However, you will perhaps alk, " if Christ has not left us an example of adult-baptifm, "which we ought to imitate, why did he not." fubmit to be baptized before he was an adult?" To this I reply, that this part of the Redeemer's conduct was founded on a very fignificant and important circumstance. As he was made under the law, he was therefore circumcifed the eighth day, according to the particular requirement of that old-testament rite. But as circumcision, to-gether with every other ceremony, was to be abolished through the introduction of a higher dispensation than that of Moses; it was therefore necessary that this superior dispensation of the gospel, should be ushered in by the ordinance of baptism, as a fign and feal of that covenant, which circumcifion of old both fignified and confirmed. Now although, John baptized wast numbers before he administered that ordinance to Christ; yet

" the kingdom of heaven," or the actual opening of the gospel-kingdom, was then only at hands But, when the Son of God himfelf was baptized in Fordan, then he "that hath the key of David" revealed the rich treasures of the new-testament, and opened a door of admission into the gospeldispensation. This was the period of Christ's folemn inauguration to his public office, which was announced and confirmed by his Father's audible testimony from heaven, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost. Into this public office he was initiated by baptism. Now, as it was particularly commanded under the law that none shou'd commence priests till the 30th year; * in conformity to this legal injunction, our Lord deferred his actual affumption of the high-priefthood 'till that time of life; and for that reason, he could not, confistently with his official capacity, be baptized 'till he arrived at the 30th year of his age. Had the Redeemer been baptized as well as circumcifed in his infancy, we should then probably have inferred, that none but infants ought to be partakers of baptism. And had he been circumcifed as Abraham was, when an adult, as well as baptized, then, we should have confined baptism, intirely perhaps, to adults. Whereas, having submitted to one ordinance in infancy, and to the other, in adult years, he has thereby sanctified both states, and exemplified the admission of infants and adults into the visible church. For, if Christ's having been baptized when an adult, be a proof that none but adults ought to be baptized; then, as Abraham was circumcifed when an adult, the same kind of reasoning might be brought to prove that none but adults ought to have been circumcifed under the law. Thus the arguments of Anabaptists on this head prove too much, and confequently involve their tottering cause in unavoidable absurdity; in which I shall leave it for a while, till I present the pious reader with a sweet quotation from Bishop Hall's contemplations. " What is bap-" tism (fays the judicious Prelate) but evangelical " circumcision? And what was circumcision but a " legal baptism? One, both supplied, and succeeded " the other. Christ would be circumcised, to " fanctify his church that was; and baptized, to " fanctify his church that should be: that so in " both testaments he might open a way to heaven. " And, no fooner is the water poured on his head, " than the heavens are opened, and the Holy "Ghoft is poured on that head which was " baptized."

However, perhaps you again argue, that the circumcifing of infants was commanded by a positive law; but that the baptizing them is no where expressly injoined throughout the whole newtestament. Well, even supposing that no explicit command to baptize infants be found there; yet may there not be an implicit one? And will not that as effectually establish the custom, as if it was expressly expressly commanded ten thousand times over? Is there any positive injunction to be found throughout the whole new-testament for the observation of the first day of the week? Yet who doubts whether that is our christian sabbath? Where is it explicitly commanded that women should receive the Lord's supper? Yet who disputes their right to that sacrament? Where is it expressly injoined that the head of a family should pray with his houshold? Yet what pious man would doubt his obligation to that domestic duty? since it is implicitly urged in various general exhortations to prayer. From whence, as well as from numerous other instances, it is evident that virtual or implicit commands are every whit as binding, as the most express ones.

Indeed an explicit command to baptize infants was not necessary, fince it was virtually (I had almost said expressly) injoined by the very institution of circumcision. For, if that fign and seal of the covenant under the old-testament dispensation was administered to infants; it was almost needless to give any fresh explicit injunction respecting their admission into the visible church by baptism: since for the same reason, that they enjoyed that privilege undisturbed, for near four thousand years before the coming of CHRIST, they ought to be kept in possession of it, the rather, since his incar-Because, Christ himself is the same; his grace the fame; his covenant the fame; the feal of the covenant, the fame in fignificance and representation; presentation; and the privileges of the covenant the fame, under both dispensations: except in a few particulars, wherein the new has confiderably the advantage of the old; which fuperiority, by the bye, would cease, if infants were not to be baptized.

6 Did not our bleffed Lord himfelf virtually command infants to be baptized, in the following address to his disciples? "Suffer little children to " come unto me, and forbid them not; for, of "fuch is the kingdom of God." Luke xviii. 16. The evangelist fays, ver. 15, that "they brought " τα ες: φη infants to him." So that some, at leaft, among the little ones, upon whom Christ laid his hands, must have been literally in a state of infancy. I lay no absolute stress upon the circumstance of their having been brought to him. But his declaration that " of fuch is the kingdom of "God," feems full to the point. The kingdom of God fignifies both the new-testament dispensation of grace, and the celestial dispensation of glory. Infants are, undeniably, subjects of the one, and candidates for the other; or, in other words, the kingdom of grace, and the kingdom of glory, confift of such. Now, if Christ does not shut them out of the gracious and glorious REALITY of both kingdoms, is it fcriptural, is it rational, or is it charitable, to suppose, he would exclude them from the sacrament, which initiates into one, and feals a covenant-right to the other? No. And therefore we will fing with Doctor Watts, CHRIST

And not forbids their infant-race;
Their feed are fprinkled with his blood,
Their children fet apart for God.

Then let each faint with chearful voice, In this large covenant rejoice; Young children in their early days, Shall give the God of Abrah'm praise!

7 The close of these sweet lines from Doctor. Watts reminds me of another argument.—In that remarkable interview between God and Abraham, recorded in Gen. xvii. 1, the Lord gave the patriarch the following extensive promise, "I will " establish my covenant between me and thee, and " thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an " everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, " and to thy SEED after thee." This rich promife includes the tenor of the covenant, the fubfiance of its inestimable blessings, and the interest which Abraham and his feed were to possess in it for ever. In order that this glorious promife and its accomplishment might be rendered still more apparently fure, the Lord gave to Abraham the facrament of circumcision. The institution of this ordinance was intended as a flanding memorial a visible token, a facramentary sign, and a ratifying feal of the covenant. But when the Lord promised the Patriarch " TO BE A GOD TO нім," (which words imply the very effence of the covenant) he included in that covenant-promife Abraham's posterity, adding, " and to thy Garage " SEED

" SEED after thee in their generations." And that the patriarch's infant-feed were comprehended under this clause of the covenant-promise, is evident, from their having been made partakers of the confirming feal of circumcision. Now if it can be made appear that the covenant confirmed to Abraham, was the everlasting covenant of grace; that the promife given to him contained the fubftance of all the gospel-promises under the new-testament dispensation; that the patriarch and his feed, to whom the promise was made, comprehended all God's covenanted people to the end of the world; and that circumcifion was a feal of the covenant, and of the covenant-promise; then, I think, it must appear even to a demonstration, that if infants were taken into a covenantrelation with God under the law by the facrament of circumcifion, they are still irrevocably confirmed in that privilege by the fucceeding ordinance of baptism.

(1) That the covenant ratified with Abraham, was the covenant of grace, appears evident even from the very tener of it. For thus runs the divine charter, "I will BE A GOD TO THEE, and to thy SEED "after thee." Jehovah was never "a God" to any man fince the violation of the first covenant, but thro' Christ. Therefore it was the covenant established through a Mediator, and consequently the covenant of grace, which God made with Abraham. But this is still farther evident from the testimony of the Apostle, "That the blessing of Abraham" (or the covenant-bleffing which God gave him and his feed) " might come on " the Gentiles through JESUS CHRIST." Gal. iii. 14. And when the same Apostle in another place recites the privileges extended to believers under the present dispensation, he expressly mentions the very term of the covenant which the Lord used to Abraham, "I will BE TO THEM A "God, and they shall be to me a people." Heb. viii. 10. From comparing which passages together, it is plain that the covenant made to Abraham and to his feed, is also confirmed to all his gentile children, and to their SEED, from generation to generation.

(2) That the covenant-promise given to Abraham, contained in it the fum and substance of all the gospel-promises under the new-testament dispenfation, appears confirmed by the following expository observation of the Apostle Paul, " God " preached before THE GOSPEL unto Abraham, " faying, In thee shall all nations be bleffed." Gal. iii. 8. It does not militate against the main argument, that this promise seems different from that made to the patriarch and his feed. The difference is only in word, not in fentiment: For, as all nations were bleffed in Abraham, because Christ's lineal defeent was traced from him; and the Lord could promife " to be his God" only through the Mediator of the covenant; confequently one promife is founded upon, interwoven, or virtually the fame with, the other. But this promise con-G 2

tained in it the fum of the gospel. Therefore gospel-promises under the new-testament, are substantially the same with those made to Abraham under the old. But those made to the patriarch included his infant-seed, and were fealed accordingly by circumcision. Therefore the same promises extend to the infant-seed of gospel-believers, and are ratisfied by baptism, our evangelical circumcision. For since the promises are the same in substance, in signification, in extent, surely no solid reason in the world can be alledged, why they should not be the same in their mode of application by a facramentary seal.

(3) I am to prove that Abraham's feed, to whom, as well as himfelf, the grand promife was made, did comprehend all God's covenanted people, Gentiles as well as Jews, and infants as well as adults, to the end of time. But this indeed the Apostle has already done to my hand in Rom. iv. 16, "To the end that the promise might be sure to " all the feed; not to that only which is of the " law," (not only to that part of Abraham's defcendents which was placed under the dispensation of the Jewish law,) "but to that" (gentile feed) " also, which is of the faith of Abraham-" that he might be the father of all them that . believe, though they be not circumcifed." ver. II. Again, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's " feed, and heirs according to the promise." Gal. iii. 29. From these passages it is evident that gentile believers are Abraham's feed as well as his immediate immediate descendents—that the one are heirs of the promise, made to Abraham, as well as the other—that both are Abraham's seed, and God's covenanted people—and consequently, that the promise which includes the infant-seed of one, extends to the consederate seed of the other; and that both have equally a right to the seal of the covenant-relation: unless you espouse the blasphemous absurdity, that Abraham's seed under the law enjoyed greater privileges, than Christ's people under the gospel. Credat Judeus Apella; non ego.

(4) The Apossel expressly declares that circumcision was administered under the law as a seal of covenant-blessings. "He received the sign of covenant-blessings. "He received the sign of seal of the righteousness of the saith which he had yet being uncircumcised." Rom. iv. 11. † Circumcision then, was to Abraham a facramentary ratification of his interest in this grand blessing of the covenant, the righteousness of faith. But this seal was administered to Abraham's infant seed; consequently infants constituted a part of God's covenanted-people, and had an undoubted right to the blessings and privileges of their consederate parents. But baptism is that under the gospel, which circumcision was that circumcision was a feal of the covenant of grace, and not merely of temporal promises; and consequently obviates the most considerable objection, that hath ever been urged against infant-baptism. —See the Family Expositor on Rom. iv. 11.

under the law. It is a feal of the covenant of grace; and therefore the Apostle calls it the "cir- cumcision of Christ," Col. ii. 11. or the christian circumcision.

I have now, Sir, endeavoured, with all the accuracy in my power, to flate the four points upon which the hinge of this part of the fubject principally turns. I think it has been fufficiently proved that the Abrahamic covenant was the covenant of grace; from the tenor of its charter, aswell as from the express testimony of scripturethat the promise made to Abraham contained the fubstance of all the gospel-promises given to God's covenanted people under the new testament and therefore included the infant-feed of believers under both dispensations-that Abraham's seed comprehended believing Jews and Gentiles, together with their children to the end of the world-and that circumcifion under the law was a feal of covenant-bleffings, as baptism is now under the gospel. The consequence then naturally deducible from these allowed premises, is; that the right of infant-baptism is founded upon the covenant of grace, upon the comprehensive extent of covenant-promises, upon the common privileges of Abraham's feed, and upon the very nature, meaning, and intent of an instituted feal. then the covenant be the fame, the promifes the fame, the privileges the fame; why should infants be denied that ordinance, which feals those bleffings now, that once were confirmed to them by circumcifion?

circumcifion? If they are capable of the thing fignified by baptism; why not of the outward and visible fign? If they are made susceptible of the covenant-blessings fealed; why should they be debarred the external feal? If they may be washed from their native pollution in the Redeemer's blood; why denied its symbol, the baptismal laver?

8 The covenant-foundation, upon which the right of infant-baptism is established, makes a grand part of the gospel-system, and is therefore frequently referred to, throughout the inspired writings. Besides the passages, which I have had occasion already to quote, upon this important subject, I shall beg leave to produce one more; which, in my opinion, is not only corroborating, but decisive also. It is the following, "For the promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." Acts ii. 39.

These words were uttered by the Apostle Peter upon a very interesting occasion. When the outpouring of the Holy Ghost upon the day of Pentecost was ridiculed by some who were present upon that marvellous occasion, Peter stood up in desence of the glorious sast; vindicated the conduct of the Apostles; pointed out those prophecies in the old testament, which clearly referred to this miraculous essuion; and then proved that the gift of the Spirit, in his ordinary and extraordinary influences, was a glorious fruit of the Redeemer's Redeemer's afcension and exaltation; as well as the purchase of his meritorious death, and the consequence of his triumphant resurrection.

This mafterly vindication was attended with immediate and univerfal fuccess. A vast multitude, overcome by the invincible power of the Holy Ghost, and cut to the heart by the pungency of the Apostle's persuasive arguments, cried out, " Men and brethren, what shall we do?" To this important inquiry the Apostle returns as important an answer, "Repent and be baptized " every one of you, in the name of Fefus Christ, " for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive " the gift of the Holy Ghost." And, as a motive for their turning to God by repentance; as a ground for their fubmitting to baptisin, the seal of the covenant; and as a certain pledge of their receiving the gift of the Holy Ghost; he urges, " For the promise is unto you, and to your " children, &c." As if the Apostle should say-The promise of the Holy Ghost, and that grand original promife made to Abraham, whereby the gift of the Spirit was afcertained to him and his feed, is to you, therefore be baptized—But the promife is not confined to you alone, but is extended to your children as confederate; and therefore, as the promise made to Abraham comprehended his infant-feed, and brought them under circumcifion the feal of the covenant, so your children are likewife interested in the same promise, and therefore to be sharers with you in the new-testament seal, baptism:-

baptism:—Yea the same promise reaches to all that are afar off, Gentiles as well as Jews, in the most remote part of the globe, the most distant period of time, or the deepest alienation of affection:—even to as many as the Lord shall call, externally by his word, and internally by his Spirit; and to the confederate children of those thus called among the Gentiles, to the end of time.

But to this interpretation you are ready to throw in various objections; and I am as ready to attempt a removal of them.

(1) Perhaps you will contend, that the promise in the text, fignifies repentance; and as repenting and believing the gospel, can only be performed by adults, therefore none, but fuch as come underthat predicament, ought to be baptized.—But to affert this, is to overlook the peculiar phraseology. of scripture, to break the grammatical connection of the fentences, and to contract the extensive promifes of the new covenant. (1) In what part of the inspired writings is repentance ever called the promise? I defy you, Sir, to produce a single passage from the whole word of God, wherein that penitential grace is once called by fuch an eminent and diffinguithing title. But even supposing (though by no means granting) that the Apostle did give it that peculiar appellation; will you infer from thence, that the promife would not extend to the children of the Lord's covenanted people? The word peravoia, which we translate repentance, properly fignifies a change of mind or a turning of the heart heart God-ward. Repentance then is a work of God, wrought internally upon the heart. Now cannot the Omnipontent Agent in this work, as eafily find access to the heart of an infant, as to that of an adult? You cannot deny this, without blasphemy. Then, if it be the internal grace that is the effence of repentance; and if this can be implanted in the breasts of infants; why may not the promise of this internal change be made to them as well as to others? And the same observation is true with respect to faith. Though the express act of believing is practicable only by adults; nevertheless, infants are as capable of the internal habit as they. For as one effential peculiarity of faith is to " purify the heart;" infants are indifputably capable of fuch effential purification-But your mistake on this subject arises from your always connecting with repentance the idea of a public profession; which is but a remote circumstance even in penitent adults themselves, and is by no. means an effential one: fince the vilest hypocrites may publicly profess to repent and believe, and yet be as estranged from a purifying change of heart, as unbaptized heathens. (2) It is contrary to grammar, to make repentance the promise alluded to by the Apostle. Let his own words speak, " — Ye shall receive the gift of the Holy "Ghost: for, the promise"—What promise? Certainly, of the Holy Ghost: for, that is the immediate antecedent. This interpretation is agreeable to the ftyle of scripture; which very frequently quently calls the Spirit "the promise of the Father, " the holy Spirit of promise, the promise of the " Holy Ghost." Acts i. 4. Eph. i. 13. Acts ii. 23. Some indeed have supposed that by the promise, we are to understand that original promise made to Abraham and his feed. This supposition is not altogether destitute of scripture-ground; for that. covenant-promise established with the Patriarch, is frequently called THE PROMISE, xar' : ξοχην by way of eminence and distinction. See Rom. iv. 13. Gal. iii. 19, 29. Heb. vi. 13. Rom. iv. 16. And indeed it is not unnatural to suppose this, from the very drift of the Apostle's address. For as he was urging upon the Jews the necessity of fubmitting to the gospel-ordinance of baptism, this might of consequence lead him up to that original promise, by virtue of which Abraham and his feed were taken into covenant with God in circumcision. But whether it fignifies the grand covenant-promise, or the promise of the Spirit, the inferential argument will be the fame; fince even the promise of the Spirit is a covenant-promise, and is founded upon that made to Abraham. For, thus faith the Lord, "I will pour my Spirit upon. " thy feed, and my bleffing upon thy offspring." Isaiah xliv. 3. Let any person but compare this promise with the 5th verse of the chapter, and he will be convinced, that it extends to the covenantfeed of Jews and Gentiles. The argument refulting from which is; if the covenant-promife of the

the Spirit included the infant-feed of the one, furely it could not exclude that of the other.

(2) You cannot perhaps agree to my interpretation, because it makes the covenant-promise extend to the infant-feed of believers, and gives them a right to baptism. But why should you object to this? Is it not a scriptural supposition? Did not the promise reach them under the law? Why not, under the gospel? "O but the word TENDOIS children, fignifies descendents in general." Well, and therefore-" it excludes infants, and can mean only adults in particular." Logica Bæotiensis! According to this particular mode of interpreting and reasoning, it seems infants are no part of a people's DESCENDENTS. And when it is faid that Zacharias and Elizabeth had no child TEXNOT, I fuppose we are to infer, that they had no grown-up children. Argumentum palmarium! I will endeavour to expose the absurdity and fallacy of this curious notion in a familiar illustration.—A king gives a free grant of a large inheritance, connected with certain titles of nobility, to one of his subjects, and to his children for ever. As fast as the heirs apparent fucceed each other, they are vested with. the estates and dignities of their ancestors; the benefits arifing from which, fome of them possess even when in a flate of infancy. These privileges they enjoy undisturbed, whether infants or adults, for hundreds and hundreds of years. We will suppose, that in process of time, a future Monarch makes fome particular inflitutions, which do not in the least alter the effential nature of the original grant, or affect the fubject of the titledeeds; but only concern the appointment of a new badge of nobility. Proper officers are delegated to draw out a fairer copy of the ancient records; and the original grant is ratified by the king's own feal; the impress of which is upon the whole, the same as of old, some small variation in the symbol only excepted. Thus the royal affent, the renewed deed, and the affixed feal, all concur to establith the ancient grant, and to make it like "the " law of the Medes and Persians which altereth " not." And thus the matter stands, for hundreds of years, after this renewed and additional ratification. It happens however, that during the minority of some of the heirs apparent, certain litigators, who envied them their privileges, labor to disposes them of the same, by an attempt to demonstrate, that the royal grant passed by the infant-fuccessors to the estates, and limited the poffession intirely to the adult-branches. As certain heralds from the king, as well as the king himself, had publicly proclaimed the superiority of the latter grant above the old one, in point of privilege; many were at a loss to conjecture, upon what the unheard-of innovation of the litigators cou'd possibly be founded. The matter at last, comes to an ecclaircissement; and the whole litigation rests upon the following circumstance. In the old records, the grant ran thus. "I will be " a king to thee, and to thy feed." But in the later later transcript of them, for seed, is read "chil-" dren." The litigators acknowledge, that the one term includes infants and adults; but argue that the other fignifies " descendents in general," and therefore ought to be limited to adults only; and that too, even when they acknowledge the fuperior excellency of the later deed.—Now, Sir, what do you think of this little illustrative story? Perhaps, you are ready to cry out, "Doth he "not speak parables?" Whether my speech be parabolical or not, I am fure it is true. And, I appeal to your own candor, whether the filly and. fallacious evafion, which I have illustrated and exposed, wou'd not upon any temporal subject, excite rifibility and difguft? and favor more of litigious quibble, than of folid truth? And yet, ...

(3) But perhaps you think that the children mentioned in the text must mean adults, because only such can be externally called by the gospel; and you are of opinion that the whole promise is limited to such. If you infer this from the order of the sentence, your inference will be unfair, absurd, and ungrammatical. The latter clause refers the extent of the promise to those that were afar off;" that is, to the gentiles, "even to as many of them as God should call" into a church state externally by his word, and internally by his Spirit. It was necessary this restriction should be made with regard to the Gentiles, lest Peter's hearers shou'd imagine that all and every of the Gentiles shou'd be taken into covenant with Gop. But he does not fay in the former claufe of the fentence, what he did in the latter; because those to whom he immediately addressed himself, were the children of the covenant to whose infant-feed THE PROMISE was made; they were called, and their offspring were interested in their call, as Abraham's children were in his. But the Apostle wou'd let them know that the promise reached the Gentiles also; and that the children of as many of them as shou'd be called, wou'd be intitled to the privileges of their ancestors .- Besides; is not this agreeable to the grammatical connection of the fentence? Tois is mangan those afar off, is the immediate antecedent to bows as many as, or whoever; confequently the verb call is grammatically to be restricted to the Gentiles afar off.

(4) But supposing that the promise was to be limited to such of the children of the Jews as should be called; yet even this concession or supposition is no argument, that none but adults can come under that denomination. Calling is either external or internal; the one, respects the general call of the gospel; the other, is effected by the secret operation of the Holy Ghost. The former cannot be effectual without the concurring influence of the latter; yet the latter can operate effectually, without the least assistance of the former: that is, God can speak powerfully to the soul by the voice of his Spirit, without addressing the ear with the voice of his gospel. If he cannot do this, how are infants to be faved? But supposing he can, then they are manifestly the subjects of effectual calling, as well as adults. To prove both the one and the other, I might multiply quotations from the word of God. But upon a fubject fo felf-evident, let one fuffice. " He (John " the Baptist) shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, " even from his mother's womb." Luke i. 15. When John was thus filled with the Spirit of God, was he not effectually called? Or, did not the fame Divine Agent, who fet apart the Baptist for a ministerial employ, likewise sanctify him from the womb, that he might be a holy vessel meet for his great Master's use? And, is the Baptist's case fingular? Cannot the Lord fanctify, or effectually call thousands of infants, as well as one, without the outward and intermediate call of his word? And, if they may be the subjects of the inward and spiritual grace of baptism; by the effectual call of the Spirit; do not Scripture, reason, charity, and common fense, unanimously suggest, that they ought to be partakers of the outward and visible sign? Besides, if infants' incapacity to hear, and understand the outward call of the gospel, be an argument for excluding them from baptism; why thould not the fame incapacity have debarred them from the right of circumcision under the law? And, if God graciously dispensed with this incapacity under the difpensation of Moses; shall we entertain the horrid supposition, that he is less gracions gracious under the mild dispensation of his DEAR SON? No. The Anabaptist may swallow such a preposterous idea: but those, who are hearers of Christ and his Apostles, will reject, with holy indignation, such an absurd and un-scriptural hy-

(5) In answer to all this you may perhaps fay, " the meaning of baptism cannot be fulfilled in " any other than these" * adults. This positive affertion I beg leave to deny; and shall endeavor to support my negative with scriptural arguments. (1) Baptism is a fign of the cleansing virtue of Christ's blood: (2) The baptismal water is a fymbol of the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost. (3) This new-testament ordinance is an initiatory rite of admission into the visible church, as circumcision was, under the law. (4) It is a badge of our covenantrelation to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoft, into whose name we are baptized. (5) Baptism is a seal of that covenant-blessing which hath come on the gentiles thro' Jesus Christ, and which was originally revealed to Abraham, in that covenantpromise made to him and his seed.

Now I ask, whether every and all of these important particulars cannot be essentially sulfilled

^{*} These are the very words of an Anabaptist-Minister, in a little systematic creed, which he delivered at his ordination. As the objection is really as weak, as it is popular among the Anabaptists, I hope my resultation of it will appear satisfactory and conclusive, to every unprejudiced reasoner.

in infants as well as adults? Cannot they be made partakers of the purifying virtue of the Redeemer's blood, and the fanctifying operation of his Spirit? Are not they subjects of Christ's gospelkingdom, as well as persons grown-up? And may not they engage, and be interested in, the privileges and blessings of the new-covenant, as well as adults?

Was not circumcifion under the law, what baptism is under the gospel? And is there not a fignificant resemblance between these two sacramentary rites, except in the mode of application? Do not both represent our natural corruption? our need of Christ? our initiation into his church? And are not both significant signs and ratisfying seals of the covenant of grace? I ask then, if the meaning of circumcision cou'd have been suffilled in infants under the law; can any scriptural reason be assigned, why the meaning of baptism cannot be fulfilled in like manner under the golpel? since both ordinances are the same in meaning.

5 Perhaps you urge that " so many as were baptized in the first ages of christianity, professed in that ordinance to be dead to sin." This is a very unfair comment on Rom. vi. 3. Let us view the apostle's words in their native dress, free from the embarrass of anababtist criticism. "So many " of us as were baptized into fesus Christ, were "baptized into his death." The grand point which the apostle means to inforce, is, that as many as were baptized under the christian dispensation, penfation, were baptized into the merit of Christ's death, and into an obligation of dying to fin. But does he mention a fingle word about making a public profession of this? Is it fair, is it pious, first to interpolate the facred text, and then to found a favorite point upon fuch unwarranted interpolation? By thus taking a detached portion, and either adding or diminishing a word, may not fcripture be made to speak any thing? - It is readily allowed, that fuch adults as were converted from heathenism or judaism, were obliged to make a public declaration of their dying to fin upon their being baptized. But does it follow therefore, that none but adults were baptized in the primitive church? Cannot infants, as well as they, die to fin, and be baptized into the merit of Christ's death? Circumcision was as fignificant a fymbol of a death unto fin as baptism. Yet infants were circumcifed under the absolute incapacity of making any public profession. And if the want of the one did not incapacitate them for admission to the other, under the law; why thould it under the gospel?

6 Though infants cannot make an explicit profession of dying to sin, yet they can, a virtual one. They can even join in taking the LORD for their GOD; and it is well known, that, under the law, they were considered as a party in the avowal of the divine cause, and in some of the most solemn covenant-acts that ever were established between GOD and his people.

Of this the following passage is a proof. "Ye "frand this day, all of you, before the LORD " your God; your captains of your tribes, your elders, and your officers, with all the men-" of Ifrael; your LITTLE-ONES, your wives, " and the stranger that is in thy camp; that "thou shouldest enter into covenant with the " LORD thy God, and into his oath, &c." Deut. xxix. 10. N. B. The names of the LITTLE-ONES are particularly recognized upon this folemn transaction; and they, as well as the aged, are represented as making a public virtual profession of allegiance to the God of Ifrael, and of entering into covenant with him. - Another apposite passage is in Foel ii. 15. In order to deprecate the divine vengeance, and to implore mercy, the LORD commands the prophet to call a folemn affembly." But who are to compose this folemn assembly? Only the aged? whose venerable years and excellent wisdom, might grace, dignify, and folemnize the awful meeting? No. Even the hoary head, and eloquent: tongue, shall not upon this occasion engross all the honor. The Lord will " ordain strength and se perfect praise, even out of the mouth of babes " and fucklings." Therefore, thus runs the divine injunction, "Gather the people, fanctify the congregation; affemble the elders; gather the children, and THOSE THAT SUCK THE BREASTS, &c."

What therefore upon earth can be more manifest, than that children; little-ones, and even the new-born infants that suck the breasts, can enter into covenant with God, and be registered. amongst his people, notwithstanding their utter inability to make an explicit profession of his name? If this was indisputably the case under the law; why should it be disputed under the gospel? If the meaning of circumcision could be so far fulfilled even in sucklings, as that they should have been once esteemed a part of the covenant-people of God; why may they not now virtually profess in baptism a renunciation of the world, the flesh and the Devil, when their parents folemnly dedicate them to the Lord in that ordinance? And why may they not be fill a party in the covenant-engagements of the Lord's believing people?

From hence therefore, it is plain (1) that God never confidered the imbecillity of infants as any bar to their being admitted to the privileges of the covenant; (2) That, as the covenant of Abraham is the very fame under both dispensations, the infant-seed of believers are still intitled to the seal of the covenant; (3) that the ancient promise made to the sather of the saithful, and quoted by Peter, includes infants as well as adults; (4) that to deny this, is to alter an unalterable grant, to rob infants of their covenant-right, and to limit, or give the lye to, the original promise made to the seed of Abraham; (5) that to deprive infants of the baptismal seal, because of their unavoidable inability inability, is to attempt to teach God, and to reflect on his unchangeable goodness and wisdom; (6) that to do this, is highly affronting to the God of Abraham, and injurious to the superior glory of the new-testament dispensation; (7) it is apparent, that the essential meaning of baptism, as it implies pardon of sin, sanctification, dying to sin, introduction to the visible church, admission to the blessings of the covenant, can be as really sulfilled in infants, as in adults; (8) and that the contrary affertion is an unmeaning quibble, and carries with it the horrid implication, that infants are not subjects of salvation.

7 Permit me to pursue this last idea, horrid as it may feem; for I am certain, it is in some degree fuggested by Anabaptism, and I can prove that it has been openly adopted by Servetus " the glory of the Anabaptists." One of his twenty arguments, or wretched fophisms, opens its mouth in the following shocking manner. " All they abide in death, who believe not on the Son of God, and the wrath of God abideth upon them; therefore infants, which cannot believe (horresco referens) LIE IN THEIR DAMNATION." * There, Sir; you fee, your "glory Servetus" speaks out, what your fentiments only filently mutter. What do you think, Sir, of his damnatory fentence against infants? Does it not carry in its tail the fling of a scorpion, and the poison of asps? How it may affect you, and your brethren, I know not; but I affure you, Sir, the dreadful intimation chills my blood, and fills my whole foul with inexpressible horror. I am far from supposing, that you and modern Anabaptists will coincide with Servetus in his horrible doctrine respecting infants. Yet, Sir, his arguing was not altogether unlike yours. I suppose he reasoned thus, "None but those that believe should be baptized: But infants cannot believe, therefore infants should not be baptized.—None but those that believe and are baptized can be faved: But infants cannot believe and consequently ought not to be baptized: Therefore infants cannot be faved."

Such, Sir, must have been Servetus's abominable mode of syllogizing, before he could give the least color of reason or scripture to his damnatory argument against infants. And, although you, and other Anabaptists may detest the horrid consequence of Servetus's logic, yet I dare affirm, Sir, that there is a near affinity between his premises and yours. For, you infer from Mark xvi. 16. that none should be baptized, but such as believe. He from the same scripture, argued, that none but those that believed and were baptized, could be faved. You exclude infants from baptism, because it is written, " He that believeth and is baptized." He, by the fame mode of arguing; excluded them from falvation. Therefore, you are driven to the following inevitable dilemma; either to give Servetus the right hand of fellowship in his damnatory damnatory doctrine, or else to renounce your interpretation of his and your favorite scripture; and in future to acknowledge that you have no more fcriptural logic for excluding infants from the kingdom of the gospel, than Servetus had, for thutting them out of the kingdom of heaven.

But in further support of your prejudices against infant-baptism, you and your brethren. alledge, that throughout the new testament we read only of adult-baptisms. It is true express mention is made only of these. But would you infer from thence, that children were never baptized. If you adopt fuch a mode of drawing inferences, either from the want of explicit mention, or even the absolute science of scripture; you might eafily infer, fometimes, groß absurdity; at other times, palpable falshood. Where is it once expressly mentioned that the churches of the Romans, Galatians, Thessalonians, or Colossans were ever baptized? Yet, to infer from the want of fuch express mention, as the Anabaptists do upon the fubject of infant-baptism, would be to reason inconfishently with the dictates of common sense.

8 But though there be no explicit mention of the baptizing of infants in the new testament, there is nevertheless a very strong implicit one. For, it is recorded that the Apostles baptized Lydia and her houshold, the jailor and all that were his, and the houshold of Stephanas. Acts xvi. 15, 22. 1 Cor. i. 16. Now is it reasonable to suppose there were neither infants nor little children children in all these three housholds? And can common sense suggest, that when the heads of these families were baptized, the Apostles passed by their confederate feed? Perhaps, to this you reply, that the houjhold only means the family in general, without including infants. This is just fuch a pitiful evafion, as I have exposed and refuted in P. 61; I will expose it again. It is said, Gen. xvii. 23, that Abraham circumcifed all the men of his house; or all his houshold. None will dare infinuate that Ishmael, although but thirteen years old, did not constitute a part of the patriarch's houshold, or was not included in the covenant of circumcifion. To prove both the oneand the other, it is written, "The felf-same day " was Abraham circumcifed, and Ishmael his fon." ver. 26. From whence it is apparent, that children are a part of the houshold; and that for the fame reason they were included with Abraham in the feal of the covenant, they ought to possess that privilege now, by baptism; and certainly did, whenever the Apostles baptized housholds.-It is faid in Deut. xi, 6, that the earth swallowed up the housholds of Korah, Dathan and Abiram. Is it supposable that there were no children in these three housholds? Lest you should be guilty of fuch a blundering fupposition, let me remind you, that in Num. xvi. 27, it is expressly recorded that their "fons and their little children" were numbered in these unfortunate housholds. Now, Sir, if the little children constituted a part of the houshold, and though personally innocent of the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, were nevertheless involved in the dreadful calamity of their rebellious sathers; is it not natural and scriptural to suppose that the little children were included in the baptized housholds of Lydia, the Jailor, and Stephanas? and that they were joint-sharers with their parents in the baptismal seal of the common salvation?

9 Did not our Lord implicitly command the baptizing of infants, in his extensive charge to the Apostles? "Go ye therefore, and teach all na"tions, baptizing them in the name of the Fa"ther, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

Mat. xxviii. 19.

I call this an extensive charge, because it reached to all nations; of which it is prefumed that infants and little children make a very confiderable part. In that comprehensive promise made to Abraham, and quoted by the Apostle, Gal. iii. 8, the Lord thus preaches his universal gospel, saying, "In thee shall all nations be blessed." There is no doubt but Jews and their children, were referred to, in this glorious promite. But it is equally undeniable, from the Apostle's testimony and matter of fact, that it comprehended gentiles alfo; upon whom, as well as Ifrael, " the bleffing " of Abraham hath come; through Fesus Christ." And why should not the term all nations include the infant-feed of Gentiles, as it manifestly does that of Jews? This must be acknowledged, un-10 less an Anabaptist will adopt the horrid implication, that infants are not included in the all nations, that are blessed in Christ. And if they are not blessed in him, they must be cursed out of him. But if this be a thought too horrid to be entertained; then, the consequence is clear, that the blessing is to the Jews and Gentiles, and their respective children; that the seals of the covenant were equally the right of the infant-seed of both; and therefore that all nations, in the promise to Abraham, and in the great command to the Aposses, is a term, equally significant and comprehensive.

10 But against all this you urge, that, the Apostles being commanded to teach all nations, their charge to baptize was therefore limited to those only that were capable of being taught. Well, supposing the command did admit of this limitation; this is still no proof that they were to baptize adults ONLY. For, children are as capable of being favingly taught the principles of chriftianity, as grown people. Samuel very early became acquainted with the voice, truth, and worship of God. And Timothy from a child knew the holy scriptures, and became wife to falvation thro' faith which is in Christ Jesus. Numbers of children in former and latter times have commenced amazing proficients in the truths of the gospel; even at the age of ten, twelve, and fourteen years. Many in the present day give evident proofs of a genuine work of divine grace. And I myself have have known and converfed with fome gracious children, who, (upon the principles of an Anabaptist) had a much better right to baptism (suppofing they had never been admitted to that ordinance before) than many adults, that have been dipped, and enrolled in "the church." One most amiable child in particular, I knew in Scotland; who, at about eleven years of age, was fo deeply impressed with the great truths of the gospel; discovered such sweet and heavenly tempers in her whole carriage; acquired fuch wifdom in the scriptures; had such a deep sense of the love of Christ, that the very mention of his precious name has, to my knowledge, made copious tears of gratitude and praife flow down her tender cheeks; and walked fo unblamably and irreprovably, even before the aged, who narrowly watched her whole behavior; that I am certain, this mirror of early piety was much better acquainted with the effence of experimental religion, than many, who " give in their experience to the church," before they are dipped.

Now, Sir, what do you think of such early followers of the Son of God, as these? Surely, such "believe in Jesus Christ; have a vital and saving faith; are called by grace to repentance," and to all the blessings of the covenant. Such are not only dead to sin; but they can even profess it too. If then "baptim be limited to such as these" (as one of your teachers saith) ought not such to be baptized? And if such are proper candidates for the ordinance, what becomes of your adultabaptism? Must you not either say that a child of twelve or sourteen years of age is an adult? or else refuse baptism to one in whom "the meaning of it can be as amply sulfilled" as in an adult of sourscore? Thus, Sir, take which side you please of the dilemma, you are still involved in an inex-

11 But, in order farther to overturn the arguments you found upon our Lord's commission to his apostles; permit me to observe that the original, as well as the commission itself, militates strongly against your favorite interpretation of it. The greek word mannevoals which we translate teach, has a more general acceptation, and fignifies disciple; a word, which though it takes in adults, does not nevertheless exclude infants and little children. The word Indeed is of a more limited fignification, and implies teaching in fuch a fense as to restrict it to those only, who are competent subjects of instruction. But madnieuw is of more general import, and fignifies to make disciples. If this interpretation be admitted, (and what man of candor or learning will oppose it?) then it must follow that infants and little children may be discipled to Christ. And that they are called disciples in the word of God, is plain from Peter's expostulation with the judaizing bigots at Jerusalem, "Why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples?" Acts xv. 10. This address was occasioned by some corrupters of the gospel gospel, who said, " Except ye be circumcised, " ye cannot be faved." The yoke then was circumcifion. The perfons upon whom this yoke was put are called disciples. But the yoke was put upon infants. Therefore they, as well as adults. are ranked amongst Christ's disciples. - And that the greek word has the general fignification I contend for, is undeniably plain from the teffimony of that excellent faint and fervant of Jesus Christ Justin Martyr. In his apology for the Christians delivered to the Emperor * and Senate of Rome, he has the following remarkable note. •• Καὶ πολλοι τινες κὰ πολλαι έξηπονθεται κὰ έβδομηποντεται, ὁι ἐκ παιδωι έμαθητευθησαν τω Χριςω, αφθοροι διαμενεσι. Several perfons among us of 60 and 70 years old, of both fexes, who were DISCIPLED to Christ in their CHILDHOOD, do continue uncorrupt." Now this authority of Fustin Martyr is the more weighty, inasmuch as the author of it wrote but 90 years after St. Matthew, and therefore must be allowed to be a competent judge of the Apostle's meaning. His testimony therefore proyes that there were co-temporaries with himself, who must have been discipled to Christ so early as even in the days of the Apostles; that they were made disciples in their childhood; and, that as Justin Martyr uses the very same word with the Apostle, this fixes the meaning of the term, and establishes the mode of discipling infants, as well as adults, by baptism. So that, confidering the general tenor of our Lord's charge to the Apostles;-that the

the universal term all nations cannot, without great absurdity, be applied to adults only, but must, according to the very import of language, include infants and little children;—that many young persons are capable of religious instruction, and of every essential qualification required of candidates for baptisin;—and that fustin Martyr's use of the word padinter determines its precise signification, by extending it to children as well as adults;—considering these particulars, it is evident, that our Lord's charge, so far from supporting, absolutely overturns anabaptism, and essablishes the contrary sentiments.

12 As to the arguments founded on adultbaptifins mentioned in scripture, they have not the least weight. For, the instances recorded there respect those only, who had been proselyted to the faith, when adults, either from the prejudices of judaism, or the gross darkness of heathenism. But, where is there mention of the baptizing any adults, who were descended from christian parents, and had the advantage of a gospel education? You cannot produce a fingle instance of this kind from the whole new testament. And therefore your arguments on this head are nothing to the purpose. We affert as well as you, that those, who are brought up Jews, Infidels, or Heathens, ought first to embrace christianity, before they are admitted into the visible church; and that in all fuch inflances adult-baptism is highly scriptural. The cafe was exactly the fame under the law. When any adult-gentiles commenced profes lytes to the jewish religion, they were circumcifed. But, wou'd it be fair to argue from fuch instances of adult-circumcifion, that there were no infants circumcifed? The difference then between us and the Anabaptists is this. We affert, in conformity to the testimony of scripture, that, as the circumcifing of the parents under the law, gave the children also a title to the seal of the covenant; the fame covenant-connection still subsists between believing parents and their infant-feed under the gospel; but this the Anabaptists deny-that this new-testament privilege is founded upon the unchangeableness of the Abrahamic covenant, -upon the promises made to Abraham and his spiritual feed for ever-upon the nature, fignification, and defign of the feals of the covenant - upon the renewal and ratification of the covenant-promifes to Gentiles as well as Jews — upon the capability of infants virtually or representatively to enter into covenant with God, notwithstanding their personal incapacity - upon the conduct of the Apostles, who baptized whole housholds - upon the comprehenfive charge of Christ to his Apostles to disciple ALL NATIONS - and upon the superiority of the dispensation of Christ above that of Moses.

But, in defiance of all these powerful arguments, the Anabaptist rejects, opposes, ridicules infant-baptism. Whether he has scripture to support such ridicule and opposition, the pious reader is to judge, from what I have already written.

And

III. It wou'd exhaust too much time, and defeat the original defign of this exposulatory letter, to quote, minutely, all that the ancient fathers have faid on the subject of infant-baptism; especially as I am far from resting the decisive evidence of the matter upon their authority, but upon the infallible testimony of the foriptures of truth. However, when a custom has prevailed for feveral fuccessive centuries; when the persons who adopted it, were men of un-exceptionable piety; when their authority is corroborated by an acquaintance with the most authentic ecclesiastical records; when the chain of their historical references may be fairly traced to the co-temporaries of the Apostles, and the Apostles themselves; and, especially, when their opinions on subjects of infinite importance, are upon the whole, of allowed orthodoxy—in fuch a cafe, though the authority quoted in favor of a particular rite, be both fallible and fecondary, it may nevertheless tend to throw fome light on that which is primary and infallible. Of this nature, and of this use, is the opinion of the primitive fathers; a few quotations from whose voluminous writings will effectually convince the candid reader, that infant-baptism is of primitive and apostolic authenticity. For

For the first 400 years after the Apostles, and from that period to the origin of the Waldenses about the year 1150, the custom of admitting infants into the vifible church by baptifm, feems to have been univerfal and undifputed. Yet, even supposing this ancient rite had been, in later ages, opposed, as some imagine; still the authority of those who florished nearest to the Apostolic Æra, ought to turn the scale: for the same reason, that those, who lived in or near the glorious Æra of the Reformation, must be more competent judges of the distinguishing doctrines of the Church of England, than any of our modern innovators, who take all imaginable pains (but without proof) to arminianize, arianize, socinianize, and pelagianize our venerable Alma Mater.

Among the venerable witnesses for the controverted point, I know none more authentic, than Irenaus. Speaking of Christ, he fays, "Omnes enim venit per semet-ipsum salvare; omnes, inquam qui per eum renascuntur (baptizantur) in Deum: IN-FANTES & parvulos, & pueros, & juvenes, & seniores. Ideo per omnem venit ætatem : & infantibus infans factus, sanctificans infantes, &c. He came to fave all persons by himself: All I mean, who by him are regenerated (baptized) unto God: infants and little ones, and children, and young men, and elder persons. Therefore he went thro' the feveral ages: for infants, being made an infant, fanctifying infants, &c." - This primitive father was born in the year after Christ's nativity 97, 10 and 4 years before St. John died. It was impossible therefore he cou'd be a stranger to the Apoftolic custom respecting baptism.-Lest we shou'd have a doubt whether Irenaus by regenerating unto God, means baptizing, let us hear his own words; because a man is always the best commentator upon himself. Speaking of the scripture-testimonies concerning the Spirit, he fays, " Potestatem regenerationis in Deum demandans dicebat eis, &c. When he gave his disciples the commission of regenerating unto God, he faid unto them, &c." Where the commission of regenerating fignifies baptizing. - Other fathers used the word in the fame fignification. St. Augustin's testimony is clear. " Christus natus est ex virgine, renatus per virginem. Christ was born of a virgin, and born again, or baptized by a virgin;" that is, John the Baptist, who was in point of celibacy, a virgin, or unmarried, I don't much like this playing upon words, even in Augustin himself. But however that is not the point in question. It is enough for the present argument, that he uses regenerating and baptizing fynonymously, not only in the place just quoted, but likewise in the title he gives the Apostles; calling them " eos per quos renascimur, those by whom we are regenerated" or baptized unto regeneration.

But in order to put this matter beyond difpute, as well as to establish the controverted subject, let us hear the testimony of that blessed witness Justin Martyr, whom I have had occasion already to quote. In his fecond Apology he has these words. "They are regenerated in the same way of regeneration, that we were regenerated; How?" του υδαλι λυτευν ποιευλαι, they are washed with water, &c."—This quotation, together with that of Augustin, proves that the sathers constantly used the word regenerating for baptizing; and therefore, that in various parts of their writings, where the greek word occurs, it is to be accommodated in the same sense, that ανακαννομος renewing and φωτισμος inlightening very frequently are.

2. The next in order of time after Irenaus is Tertullian. But his testimony is of a different nature, though as full to the present argument. This whimfical man, fell into strange mistakes, and adopted the hærefy of the Montanists. After forfaking that fect, he established a party of his own, calling his followers after his own name, Tertullianists. It is not to be wondered that a person of such an extremely versatil genius, shou'd adopt many whimfical ideas on baptism, as he did upon more important subjects. And that he did, any person may see, who will take the trouble to peruse his perplexed thoughts de Baptismo. As a specimen of his oddities, take the following. He advises baptism in some, to be deferred 'till marriage. And speaking of infants he says, " Quid festinat innocens at as ad remissionem peccatorum? What need their innocent age make fuch hafte, to the forgiveness of fins?" This odd question, which smells as strong of the pelagian leaven, as it it does of nonsense, intimates his disapprobation of baptizing infants, because of their supposed guiltlessness. So that he would not have them baptized, till they committed some actual sin; and not even then, 'till they were married. And he might as well have gone a little farther, and prohibited baptism 'till after they were dead. But waving such soolinh absurdaties, it is sufficient to our purpose, that Tertullian's opposition to infant-baptism, is an implicit proof that it had been the general usage of the church, from which he departed. To or else why did he oppose it?

3 Origen, who imbibed the notion of the Platonists respecting the præexistence of souls, is as clear however on the subject of infant-baptism, as Tertullian is consused. In his comment on the epistle to the Romans, he adverts to the circumstance of a facrifice having been offered for every child that was born under the law, and concludes his observations with faying, "Pro hoc & ecclesia ab Apostolis traditionem suscepit etiam parvulls Bartismum dare, For this reason it was, that the church had from the Apostles a tradition (or order) to give baptism even to infants." And again; in his 8th Homily on Levit. xii. he says, "Addi his etiam illud potest ut requiratur quid causa sit, cum baptisma ecclesia in remissionem pecca-

[†] When any person quoted the authority of Teitullian upon any subject, it was customary to stop his mouth with St. Hierom's observation concerning him. "Illum hominem ecclesia non fuisse; That man did not belong to the church."

torum detur, SECUNDUM ECCLESIÆ OBSERVAN-TIAM, etiam PARVULIS baptismum dari. Besides all this, let it be considered, what is the reason, that whereas the baptism of the church is given for forgiveness of sins, INFANTS also are by the

4 This testimony from Origen is so full and so express to the general usage of the church in baptizing infants, that it does not require a fingle additional observation to enhance its credibility. However, as some Anabaptists have doubted whether this testimony be genuine; in order to give a proof of its undoubted authenticity, I will recite for the candid reader, a circumstance, which will elucidate the quotations I have made, and demonstrate at least that Origen, notwithstanding fome peculiar fentiments, did acknowledge infant-baptism to be an apostolic custom -- St. Hierom, who had a univerfal acquaintance with Origen's writings in their original language, fays, that he (Origen) allowed that infants were proper fubjects of baptism, as sinners; but that he denied any derivative guilt from Adam; and therefore accounted for their fins by his platonic. hypothesis of the præexistence of souls. In allufion to which curious notion, St. Hierom thus addresses the Pelagians, "If the forgiveness of the fins, which are another's (Adam's) feem to you unjust, or such, as one (an infant) incapable of committing actual fin, has no need of; then, transite ad Amasium vestrum (Origenem) qui præterita in calis & antiqua delicta folvi dicit in baptismo, march over to your beloved (Origen) who fays, that in baptism are forgiven those fins, which were committed in the celestian regions."

It would be foreign to my subject, either to attempt here any refutation of Origen's peculiar fentiment, or to vindicate Hierom's firictures on him and his nearly-allied brethren, the Pelagians. It is fufficient for the purpose of the present argument, that Origen, upon the authority of Hierom, did allow the baptizing of infants; to fupport the propriety of which, he was obliged to fly to the supposition of their having sinned in a præxistent state, before they were born. as Origen denied original fin, and as infant-baptism was founded upon that doctrine; if that rite had not been established upon the general usage of the apostolic church, and if Origen was not fully convinced of it too; is it not plain, that he would have availed himself of an opportunity to flip his head out of a noofe, in which he was inclosed by the very meaning of infant-baptism, and from which he could not, with any tolerable grace, extricate himfelf, without adopting the abfurd opinion of the Platonists? Besides, Origen might very eafily have known, whether he had himself been baptized in infancy, and whether that had been an apostolic custom. For, as he was born in the year 185, which is the year after the Apostles 85, and either his Grand-father or Great-grand-father must have lived in the very time plied to his own family for information upon the fubject. But as he never once mentions fuch a fource of intelligence, and explicitly acknowledges the right of infant-baptism; his filence in the one case, and his acknowledgments in the other, concur to evince the rite to have been of primitive authority, and to prove the more than probable authenticity of the quotations I have made.

The next authentic witness I shall beg leave to produce, is Cyprian. This eminent faint was Bishop of Carthage. During his residence at that metropolitical city, one Fidus, a country Bishop, fent a letter to Cyprian, requesting his opinion upon two particular points; one of which was, whether an infant might be baptized, before the eighth day. * No less than 66 neighboring Bishops happened to sit in council with Cyprian, at the time that Fidus's letter arrived. Its contents were therefore laid before this venerable fynod; and the unanimous opinion of the general council was transmitted to Fidus, in a trulyapostolic letter, which bore the following title. Cyprianus & cæteri collegæ, qui in Concilio affuerunt, numero 66, Fido fratri salutem. Cyprian, and the rest of the Bishops, who were present at the Council, fixty fix in number, to Fidus our brother, fend Greeting.

^{*} N. B. The question was, not whether infants ought to be baptized at all, (that was universally allowed, and particularly implied in the very purport of Fidus's inquiry,) but whether they shou'd be baptized fooner than the eighth day, because that was the time limited for circumcisson.

As the epistle is too copious to admit of an intire transcript, I shall therefore content myself with a few extracts, full to the point. - " As to the case of infants; whereas you judge they are not to be baptized within two or three days after they they were born, &c. we were all of a contrary opinion, and judge that the grace and mercy of God are not to be denied to any person that is born. For, God, as he accepts no one's person, so not their age. We judge that no person is to be hindered from obtaining the grace I (of baptism) by the law (of gospel liberty) that is now appointed; and that the spiritual circumcision § ought not to be restrained by the circumcision that was according to the flesh: but that all are to be admitted to the grace of Christ .- How much less reason is there (than in the case of adults) to refuse an infant (baptism,) who being newly born, has no (actual) fin, fave that being descended from Adam, according to the flesh, he

The venerable Bishop points out at once, the superiority of baptism, above circumcisson, and yet the significant resemblance between both. The old-testament rite he calls circumcisson according to the steps, the new-testament ordinance, he styles spiritual circumcisson; probably in allusson to Gol. ii. 9, where the Apostle calls it the circumcisson of Christ, or christian circumcisson. A strong intimation this, that the Fathers supposed an analogy between circumcisson and baptism; and that upon this analogy is sounded the admission of infants to the seal of the covenant under the present dispensation. With this agree the words of Epiphanius, "And for baptism, she (the catholic church) accounts it to be in Christ, instead of the old circumcisson."

has from his very birth contracted the contagion of death anciently threatened. Therefore, it is not for us to hinder any person from baptism and the grace of God. Which rule as it holds for all; so we think it magis circa infantes & recens-natos observandum, MORE ESPECIALLY TO BE OBSERVED IN REFERENCE TO INFANTS, AND PERSONS NEWLY-BORN."

Such was the explicit determination of the famous Council of Carthage, convened Anno Dom. 253, and headed by the venerable Carthaginian Bithop St. Cyprian. To the decisions of this remarkable convocation and its blessed prolucutor, the fathers frequently refer; but more especially St. Augustin, in various parts of his controversy with the Pelagians. In a sermon delivered at Carthage, he has the following memorable observation. "Holy Cyprian was asked whether an infant might be baptized before the eighth day. The question was of the day of baptizing; for, of original sin there was no question."

Since then the references of St. Augustin, prove the authority of the Council of Carthage; and fince

While modern Anabaptists would do well to take notice that the point, agitated in the Council of Carthage, respected only the proper day for baptizing infants, not the ordinance itself; modern Pelagians are likewise requested to observe, that, about the doctrine of original sin, upon which the right of infant-baptism is founded, there was, it seems, in blessed Cyprian's days, no question at all. If that venerable father could but visit our land, how would he be associated at the contrast! For, Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis!

both concur in admitting the right of infantbaptism, as an undisputed custom in the primitive church; he that doubts the authenticity of the quotations taken from the Cyprianic Epistle, may as well doubt whether there ever existed such men, as Cyprian and Augustin, or whether

6 Gregory Nazianzen, in his oratio de baptismo, fays, "What fay you to those that are infants, and not in capacity to be sensible, either of the grace (of baptism) or the loss of it? Shall we baptize them too? Yes, by all means. For, it is better that they be sanctified without their own sense of it, than that they should die unsealed and uninitiated. Και τυτυ λογος ημιν η ομταημέςος πεςίομη, ΑΝΕ, A GROUND, OR REASON, TO US OF THIS, IS CIRCUMCISION, which was given on the eighth day, and was τυπική σφεαιις, a TYPICAL SEAL, and was practised on those, that had no use of reason."

wherein he points out the parallel between Elias and John the Baptist, thus expatiates on the circumstances of Jordan being driven back. "Ille sub Elia recursus undarum in originem fluminis, significavit salutaris lavacri futura mysteria; per quæ in primordia naturæ suæ qui baptizati fuerint PARVULI a malitia reformantur. That returning of the waters to their spring-head signified the suture mystery of the laver of salvation; by which those LITTLE ONES, that are baptized, are brought back

18 John Chrysostom, * is equally strong in his testimony on infant-baptisin. In his 40th Homily on the book of Genesis, he says, "Our circumcision, 'n το Βαπλισματος I mean that of baptism, has no determinate time, as that (circumcision) had; but one that is is 'αμξω ηλικία in the beginning of his age, or one that is in the middle of it, or one that is in his old age may receive this (new-testament) circumcision." And, in another place, "For this reason, we baptize infants also, though they have not any (actual) sins."

o Hierom, who was Augustin's cotemporary, was also his co-auxiliary, in the stand which both made against the progress of Pelagianism. And many of the arguments, urged by these two venerable witnesses, in their united opposition to the pelagian hæresy, were founded upon the scriptural meaning of infant-baptism: from whence it arose, that more was said upon this subject, while the pelagian controversy lasted, than at any other period whatever. But, for some years before Pelagius broached his hæresy, both Augustin and Hierom maintained a vigorous disputation with

The greek etymology of Chrysosom is golden-mouthed. An epithet given to this venerable father, on account of the mellistuent oratory that poured from his golden tougue. So highly enraptured were the people with his public ministrations, that it became almost proverbial to say, "It was better the san should not shine, than that John should not preach!"

the Donatists: the ground of which was, not the right of infant-baptism, (for that both the Donatists and Pelagians acknowledged §) but whether, the ordinance of baptism was invalidated by the personal ungodliness of the minister who dispensed it; and whether those who were subjects in such a case, ought to be rebaptized. The Donatists afferted both the one and the other, and were therefore literally Anabaptists or rebaptizers; Augustin and Hierom, on the other hand maintained the contrary. A proof, by the bye, that these two orthodox sathers were not only warm advocates for infant-baptism, but likewise vigorous opponents of Anabaptism.

Though the controverfy with the Donatiffs did not immediately respect the baptizing of infants, yet that subject was occasionally introduced, and acknowledged both by them and their antagonists. Hence Augustin in his book de baptismo contra Donatistas, invalidates the ground of their schism respecting Cecilian, who, as they said, had of To prove that the chief matter of debate between the orthodox and the Donatifts respected anabaptism or rebaptization. I prefent the reader with the following extract from the decisions of the third Gouncil of Carthage, headed by Aurelius. "Some that have been teachers in that seet (the Donatifts) would come over with their congregations, if they might have the same places among us, &c.—But this I (Aurelius) leave to a farther determination of our brethren, &c.—Only that they will consent that such as, (N. B.) were baptized by them (the Donatists) in infancy, may be admitted to orders."

once denied christianity under the heathen emperors, and was nevertheless afterwards retained in the church, and permitted to do the office of a bishop; and after wiping off this groundless accufation from Cecilian's character, he then proceeds to shew, that if their charge had been well grounded, even that did by no means justify their schismatical departure from the church; because, upon fuch a principle, the purest church upon earth would not be exempt from the pretentions of schism. After shewing, that the validity of an. ordinance depends on the authority of God, not on the goodness of the person, who dispenses it: and confequently, that those who were baptized by an erroneous Bishop ought not to be re-baptized; Augustin fays, of fuch, " Nec tamen ideo non accepisse baptismum existimantur. They are not therefore to be thought not to have received real baptism."—And, having had occasion to speak of the penitent thief, who obtained falvation, without baptism, he argues, that that is no more an argument against the necessity of baptism, where it may be had, than the example of baptized infants, obtaining falvation, is an argument against the necessity of faith, when the subject is capable of it; but that is an argument that one of these may be without the other; and fo that erroneous ministers, may give true baptisin, (provided they dispense it in the right form) which ought not to be reiterated, even when the baptized person comes to the knowledge of the truth. " As the thief thief, who through necessity was not baptized, and yet was partaker of falvation, because by his piety he had it spiritually; so, where baptism is had, though the party through necessity, go without that" (act of faith) "which the thief had, yet he is saved. Which traditum tenet universitas ecclediate the whole body of the church holds, as delivered to them, cum parvuli in fantes baptizantur, in the case of little infants baptizantur, in the case of little infants baptizantur, who yet cannot confess with the mouth unto salvation, as the thief cou'd: et tamen nullus christanorum dixerit eos inaniter baptizari, and yet no christian man will say that they are baptized to no purpose."

It St. Augustin, in his letter to Boniface, is equally full and fatisfactory. That Bishop had requested Augustin's opinion respecting some points, the recital of which would here be both tedious and foreign to our purpose. It is sufficient just to quote the following passage from Augustin's answer. "An infant, though he be not yet constituted a fidel (actual believer) by that (exercise of) faith, which consists in the will of (adult) believers; yet he is, by the SACRAMENT of that faith: for, he is called a fidel, non ad rem ipsam mente annuendo, not from his mental consent to the thing, but from his RECEIVING THE SACRAMENT OF IT."

In his book de Genesi, the same advocate concludes a long chain of reasoning thus, "Cosuetudo tamen matris ecclesiae in BAPTIZANDIS PARVULIS nequaquam nequaquam spernenda est, neque ullo modo superstua deputanda, nec omnino credenda nisi apostolica esse traditio, The custom of our mother the church, in baptizing infants, must not be difregarded, nor be esteemed superstuous, nor be thought to be any other than an apostolic tradition."

Omitting fome other authorities, both from Councils and Fathers which might be brought, to give a fuperadded fanction to the controverted rite, and to the arguments, which fupport it; I hasten to that period, wherein the pelagian haresy broke out. A period, memorable for one of the most important controversies, that was ever agitated throughout the churches of Christ; and a period, which stamps immortal honor on the name of the great Augustin.

No fooner had the church been respited from the schismatical altercations of the Donatists, than it was alarmed with the audacious assault of an hitherto-unheard-of hæresy; which struck at the very basis of the gospel, and laid the soundation of intricate and innumerable disputations.

This new harefy principally confifted in a rejection of the doctrine of original fin. As the translation of guilt, and the derivation of corruption, from the first apostate man to all his descendents, constitute the two essential branches of this fundamental article; both were consequently denied, by the abettors of the new hæresy; who were therefore strenuous advocates for the intire

dignity of human nature.

The person, "qui novam condidit hæresin" (as Dr. Cave says) who sounded this new hæresy, was one Pelagius; from whom, the sentiments, which characterized his erroneous system, have been ever since distinguished by the title, Pelagianism. *

This Hæresiarch, together with his principal co-adjutor, Celestius, had industriously, yet secretly, propagated his errors at Rome, about the year 410: When, that city being taken and racked by the Goths, the two hæretical colleagues were obliged to decamp. But it proved an unfortunate decampation for the African churches. For, while Pelagius steered towards the east, Celestius pitched his tent at Carthage; and both, in their respective departments, labored to establish error, with all the guile of sophistry, and all the infinuation of plausible address.

The errors of Pelagius had made some progress, before Augustin cou'd prevail on himself to credit the rumor of his (Pelagius's) desection from the truth. And, so exceedingly reluctant was the charitable Augustin to entertain an unsavorable idea of one, for whose literary and in-

^{*} I believe it is universally allowed; that Pelagius was a native of Wales; and that this arch-hæretic was called Pelagius, a pelago, because he lived near the sea; but his original and genuine name was Morgan: a circumstance, which has induced an eminent modern writer, to discrimina e the pelagian hæresy, by the more proper epithet of Morganism.

genuous character he had before expressed the highest veneration; that, even, after the publication of Pelagius's errors, Augustin was willing to hope the hærefiarch did not absolutely mean, what his writings feemed to imply.

But, when Pelagius reiterated, and obstinately persisted in his errors; Augustin thought himself indifpenfably bound no longer to retain his veneration for Pelagius at the expence of truth; and therefore, readily obeyed the call, which fummoned him to the field of controversy; in which the venerable Hierom was his conspicuous fellow-foldier.

12 Anno Dom. 412. Augustin published his first controversial treatise; and, not long after, at the instance of Marcellinus, a Carthaginian nobleman. he wrote two books more; as well for the effablithment of that noble inquirer after truth, as for the refutation of the Pelagian harely. grand defign of all these works, is, to vindicate the doctrine of original fin, from the aspersions and mifrepresentations of pelagianism.

13 The arguments, which both Augustin and Hierom urged, in their joint opposition to pelagianism, were principally founded on the end, meaning, and right of infant-baptism. Hence, the last of the three books above-mentioned, bears the following title, " Of the guilt and forgiveness of fins, and of the BAPTISM OF INFANTS." And in the body of the same book, Augustin states the

conclusive manner. " If these (infants) who, 'tis plain, have committed no (actual) fin, are not held captive under the original bond of fin; how did Christ, who died for sinners, die for them? If they are not diseased with any fickness of original fin; why are they carried to Christ the physician, to receive the SACRAMENT of their eternal falvation, by the godly fear of their parents, who run with them to it? Why is it not faid to them in the church, 'Carry back from hence thefe innocent creatures: the whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick: Christ came not to call the righteous, but finners?' - Nunquam dictum est, nunquam dicitur, nunquam omino DICETUR in ecclesia Christi tale commentum. Such an odd thing never was faid, never is faid, and NEVER WILL BE SAID + in the church of Christ."

Augustin quotes numerous passages of scripture, in pursuance of the same argument; proving, that the very institution of baptism implied the lost condition of the persons baptized. And then he adds, "Porro, qui parvulos baptizandos esse concedunt, qui contra austoritatem universa ecclesia,

[†] If ever Augustin was under the influence of a prophetic impulse, it certainly failed him in the present prognostication. For, whereas to assert, "that infants are not diseased with original sin, and ought therefore to be carried from the baptismal font, as being persectly innocent," was an oddity or sistion, never broached before, or in the time of Augustin; cou'd he but revisit christendom, he wou'd alter his nunquam dicetur; and find, that the oddity, once so scarce, is now, alas! become a very forular company.

proculdubio per Dominum & Apostolos traditam, vernire non possunt, &c. Now then, fince they (the Pelagians) GRANT that infants must be baptized, as being unable to oppose the Authority of the whole church, which doubtless was delivered by our Lord and his Apostles, &c."

14 In the course of the same chain of reasoning, Augustin quotes a confiderable portion of Cyprian's epiftle to Fidus; in order to prove, that, during the fession of the first council of Carthage. there was no dispute about original sin, nor about infant-baptifm itself, but only concerning the proper time for dispensing it. * He then passes to the authority of Hierom; and afterwards expresses his own fentiments thus, "For my own part, I do not remember that I ever HEARD any other thing from any christians, that received the old and new testament, non solum in catholica ecclesia, verum etiam in qualibet hæresi vel schismate constitutis; neither from such as were of the CA-THOLIC CHURCH, nor from fuch as belonged to any sect or schism. From whence it is that this trouble is flarted upon us, I know not; but a little while ago when I was at Carthage, I just curforily heard fome transient discourse of some people, who were talking that infants are not baptized, that they may receive remission of sins. Though I was fomewhat flartled at the No-VELTY, &c. †"

Can any thing be stronger, or more conclufive, than this evidence of St. Augustin? He positively declares, that he never even heard of any christian, any haretic, or schismatic, who denied that infants were baptized for pardon of sin. Much less then did he ever hear of any, who infinuated, that they thou'd not be baptized at all. And, if either the rite itself, or the meaning of it, had been controverted, from the days of the Apoffiles; Augustin cou'd not have been ignorant of fuch a circumstance; for, he was deeply converfant in church-history; of which he gave an evident proof, by publishing, foon after, a history of all the sects and opinions, from the apostolic æra down to his own time. Befides, nothing but the most indubitable evidence, could have warranted 'Augustin's peremptory declarations on this subject; fince he was narrowly watched by Pelagius, whose extensive knowledge of history and all the branches of literature, would have enabled him to difcern the least flaw in Augustin's calculations.

15 About three years after Augustin's books faw the light, Anno Dom. 415, Hierom wrote his Dialogues, between Atticus and Critobulus. The former of these two characters represented a Catholic; the latter, a Pelagian. These dialogues manisestly decypher the peculiar tenets of Pelagius; though they do not expressly mention his name. The greatest part of them is levelled at one favorite branch of pelagianism; viz. perfection, or, the possibility of living perfectly free from all all fin. Throughout the colloquial debate between Atticus and Critobulus, the latter endeavors to exemplify his arguments for finless perfection. by the state of infants; concerning whom, the perfectionist proposes the following sly and fophistical demand, " Grant me this at least, that they, who CANNOT sin, are WITHOUT sin." the Antipelagian did not choose to make an acknowledgement, which wou'd manifestly strike at the doctrine of original fin, and overthrow the dictinction between the external act, and the internal being of fin; he therefore supports his diffent, by adverting to the right and intent of infant-baptism. For, when the Pelagian demands, " For what reason are infants baptized?" His antagonist replies, "That in baptism their sins may be forgiven."

This testimony from Hierom is as clear a demonstration as possible, that at the time he penned his dialogues, the right of infant-baptism was universally acknowledged, as well by the foes, as the friends of truth. But, of this I shall

to the church there, for priest's orders. But, as there had prevailed a well-grounded supicion of the heterodoxy of Celestius's opinions; there was proposed a previous strict examination of the superior of the fuspected hæretic. Accordingly he was cited before the council; and the principal interrogators were Aurelius the bishop, and Paulinus the deacon. Several articles, respecting original sin, the nature of grace, and the state of infants, were produced against him; some of which he acknowledged; while others he evaded. There was a fufficiency of evidence, even from Celestius's own mouth, to point out the danger of taking into the bosom of the church, one, who wou'd act there as an envenomed viper. Accordingly, rank hærefy being detected under the sheeps - clothing of this Hibernian * Welf; his application for orders was rejected, and he himself expelled. - But the point ad rem, in this narrative, is; in the course of Celestius's examination, when he had been hard bushed with arguments, founded on the nature of infant-baptism; though he denied or equivocated the doctrine, which these arguments tended to establish; yet he dropped the following memorable concession respecting the rite itself, "As FOR INFANTS, I ALWAYS SAID, THAT THEY STAND IN NEED OF BAPTISM, AND THAT THEY OUGHT TO BE BAPTIZED."

17 Celestius's affociate in error, Pelagius, was necessitated to make equally strong concessions, though they manifestly wounded his own cause. In the Creed, which he sent to the Bishop of Rome, is the following article, "Baptisma unum tenemus, quod iisdem sacramenti verbis in infantibus, quibus etiam in majoribus afferimus esse celebrandum. We hold one baptism, which we say ought to be administered, with the same sacramental words, to infants as to grown persons." - Together with his confession of faith, Pelagius transmitted to Rome, a fort of apologetic epiftle; which the fubtle hæresiarch intended as a vindication of his principles, and as a mean of infinuating himfelf into the good graces of Pope Innocent. Upon this fame epistle Augustin comments thus, "Ob-. ferve, how Pelagius attempted flily to deceive even the episcopal judgment of the Apostolic See, when he fays, Se ab hominibus infamari, quod neget parvulis baptismi sacramentum; that men do flander him, as if he denied the facrament of baptism to infants." And again. " Quis tam impius, qui parvulos exortes regni calorum esse velit, dum eos baptizari vetat? Who can be fo IMPIOUS as. to hinder infants from being baptized, and thereby exclude them from the privileges of the kingdom. of Gop?"

But all this was but a specimen of Pelagius's evasive florith. The pretended flander, from which he attempted to vindicate himself, was never charged upon him. For, whereas his apology respects only infant-baptism itself; the charges of his opponents were confined intirely to his denial of the end of that ordinance. Augustin and his co-adjutors in the cause of truth, argued, that infants were baptized for the forgiveness of sin; and this scriptural hypothesis constituted the principal battery in all their assaults upon pelagianism. But observe with what artful dexterity, the evasive hæresiarch slips his head out of the collar. Instead of attempting a refutation of the main argument, sounded upon the end of infant-baptism; he slies off to a pompous vindication of himself from a supposed defamation, which did not in the least concern the question in debate.

18 But notwithstanding all Pelagius's ingenuity. artifice, and evafion; his orthodox antagonists were enabled to form fuch a Gordian knot round the neck of his fystem, as all the magic of the flippery Proteus's pen was infufficient to dissolve. The fertility of his invention, fo prodigious upon other fubjects, failed him here; fo that the unextorted acknowledgments, he made, in support of infant-baptism, necessarily involved him in a labyrinth of difficulties, respecting original fin: while his opponents exulted in the triumph of truth. Thus, fays Augustin, the Pelagians "circumstipati & divinarum auctoritate lectionum. & antiquitus tradito & retento firmo ecclesia ritu, in baptismate parvulorum; were beset with the authority of God's word, and with the established usage of the church, founded on antiquity, respecting infant-baptism."

From all the historical quotations, which I have produced, does it not manifestly appear, (1) That infant-baptism is a rite, founded upon the earliest, and most venerable authorities? having the sanction of Councils, Fathers, and Apostles? (2) That it has been ever esteemed as a succedaneum to circumcision under the law? (3) That, for the first sour centuries from the Apostolic Æra, it was an univerfal and undifputed custom? (4) That the altercations, which were ventilated by certain schismatics, did not concern the ordinance itself, but some less important matters; such as, whether infants shou'd be baptized before the eighth day; whether perfons baptized in an erroneous church shou'd be rebaptized; and whether fuch shou'd be admitted to ecclesiastical offices. &c. (5) That even the Donatifts themselves, who were, in one fense, Anabaptists, did nevertheless admit of infant-baptifm? (6) That the famous pelagian controversy, which commenced the beginning of the fifth century, respected, not the right, but the end of infant-baptism? for (7) That Pelagians and Antipelagians were all unanimous in admitting the primitive authenticity of the custom; and therefore, that however thussling and evafive, the conduct of Pelagius and Celestius might have been in other parts of the controverfy; upon this subject, their concessions were uniformly explicit and unambiguous.

And here, I beg your attention, Sir, for a moment, while I make an observation, suggested by the behavior of Pelagius, during his controversy with Augustin, on the doctrine of original sin.

19 It has been already proved, that the main arguments of Augustin, in favor of the controverted doctrine, were founded on infant-baptism; and that the pelagian party was hard pushed by these arguments, as well as by their own acknowledgments on the subject. Now, if infant-baptism had had been a mere traditionary rite; would not the pelagians have ranfacked every authority to demonstrate its spurious origin? And, would they not have triumphed in any discovery, that might have countenanced their rejection of an ordinance, the very end of which gave such a formidable shock to their whole system? Had the point been ever made the subject of disputation; would not that have in some measure afforded ground for opposition from them too? Yet, we do not find that they ever attempted to dispute the matter?

20 Besides; it is well known that Pelagius, was a man of considerable sagacity, and extensive erudition; * and one, whose knowledge of antiquity would have enabled him to determine, whether infant-baptism was of spurious tradition, or apostolic validity. He had not a retrospect of much more than 300 years, from whence to draw his intelligence. And surely there were some records, traditions, or church-history extant in his time, that would enable him to arrive at a degree of certainty upon the subject. Yet, we never find him making any historic references, as a plea against the opinion of his antagonists; but, on the contrary, he acquiesces in their judgment even when such acquiescence proves a dagger in the heart of his savorite system. Hence we hear him honestly declaring, "Nunquam se, vel impium aliquem hæreticum audisse, qui hoc, quod proposuit de parvulis, diceret: That he never heard, no not even any IMPIOUS HERETIC say what he had mentioned concerning infants" being refused baptism.

However, had Pelagius lived in the twelfth, instead of the fifth century; he would have confronted fome "IMPIOUS HERETICS," who did deny both infant and adult-baptism. But of these

I shall have occasion to speak presently.

21 The controversy, which commenced in the fifth century, drew from the contending parties, such reciprocal concessions with regard to infant-baptism, as universally established the validity and primitive authenticity of that ordinance, during the whole controversial period: Insomuch, that its general establishment then, rendered it an uncontroverted point, for six successive centuries, from the time of Augustin. And this, an Antipadobaptist + himself acknowledges, "The authority of Austin was it, which carried the baptism of infants, in the following ages, almost (he should have said, altogether) without controul."

22 About the beginning of the twelfth century, a spurious sect started up, called by the names of Cathari, Luciferians, &c. They might be very properly called Luciferians, because their principles were literally luciferian, or devilish. For they held (1) " That the evil God, or Devil, made the vifible world; (2) That all the facraments are vain and devilish; (3) That all infants are punished eternally, no less than murderers and thieves." As their diabolical contempt for the christian facraments induced them to reject all water-baptism, they therefore substituted a ridiculous mode of baptizing by fire; the abfurdity and blasphemy of which, Ecburtus Schonaugiensis exposed in a treatise he wrote, A. D. 1160. From hence it is apparent that these impure Cathari, or blind Luciferians, were branches of the old corrupt flock of the Manichees; and, that for the fame reason, any one would quote them, in support of Anabaptism, he might also produce their authority in favor of Quakerism.

23 About the year 1130 another feet rose up, called Petrobrusians; from one Peter Bruis or Bruce, an ignorant impious renegado Frenchman. Some have supposed they were a branch of the original Waldenses. But such a supposition incurs a manifest anachronism, or miscalculation of time. For, the origin of the Waldenses was posterior, by at least 20 years, to that of the Petrobrusians. Besides, the impious tenets of the latter, are a strong implication, that they had no real connection with the former. The Petrobrusians, it is acknowledged, did deny infant-baptism; and so they did infant-salvation too; as Peter, Abbot of Glugny

Clugny, proves in the charge he wrote against them, A. D. 1146, and Cassander likewise; who exclaims, expostulates, and reasons thus. "Oh the difference between mercy and cruelty! Between Christ lovingly receiving infants, and these hæretics impiously repelling them!" Cassander aggravates a charge of novelty against the Petrobrusians; by alledging, that if infant-Baptism be a nullity, then " all the world has been hitherto blind; and, by baptizing infants for above a thousand years, has given but a mock-baptism, and made but phantastical christians, &c. - And, whereas all France, Spain, Germany, Italy, and all EUROPE has had never a person, now for 300 or almost 500 years, baptized otherwise than in infancy, it has had never a christian in it."

24 Bernard, Abbot of Clareval, commonly called St. Bernard, complaining of the mischievous tendency of the Petrobrusian principles, in a letter to the Earl of St. Gyles's, observes, among other things, "that the infants of christians were denied the grace of baptism, and not suffered to come to their falvation, though our Saviour compassionately cry out in their behalf, Suffer little children, &c."—This complaint issued in the expulsion and banishment of Henry, Peter's associate, who had been hitherto harbored in the Earl's house.—And in the year 1139, the Lateran Council under Pope Innocent the 2nd, condemned Peter Bruis for rejecting infant-baptism.

From the origin of the Petrobrufians; from the impious tendency of their principles; from the abominable conduct of their founders, Peter and Henry; * and from the opposition they met with, particularly on the subject of infant-baptism; it feems more than probable, they were no genuine branch of the primitive Waldenfes.

25 Besides; that the adhærents of the illustrious Valdo, were advocates for infant-baptism, seems evident from the present practice of their descendents, as well as from the report of antiquity.
(1) The present Waldenses or Vaudois, in Piedmont and Provence, do universally admit of infant-baptism; and it is reasonably to be supposed, that their practice, in this respect, is sounded on the custom of their renowned ancestors. (2) Several ancient confessions, particularly, that of the Bohemian Waldenses in 1508, prove the point. Indeed, upon their departure from the antichristian trumpery of Rome, they renounced the errors of the

Romish church, respecting the sacraments as well as the fystem of her doctrines in general. For, they strenuously denied, in opposition to Rome, that any facrament confers grace merely ex opere operato. Hence, a just detestation of the human inventions, added to the mode of dispensing infant-baptism, induced the original Waldenses, rather to postpone the baptizing their children. than to countenance the abominable superstitions of the mother of harlots. This laudable scrupulofity, added to the frequent peregrinations of their own ministers, occasioned sometimes adultbaptisms even among the Waldenses. But this was a matter of contingent necessity, not of deliberate choice. And yet, upon unavoidable instances of this nature, some have grounded a difingenuous plea, that the Waldenses were Antivadobaptists. But, such persons might, with equal truth, affert, that they were down-right Papists. (3) Wall, (to whose history I have had occasion frequently to refer) fays, that an ancient record of the Waldenses, called the spiritual almanack, and quoted by Perin, in his history of that people, expressly admits infant-baptism: And, it is a fact of universal notoriety, that they were found in the practice of it, when the Protestants of Luther's reformation fent to know their estate.

As I have already touched upon the origin of the German Anabaptists, who greatly annoyed Luther and Calvin, and brought such a scandal upon the very name of reformation; I shall not reiterate reiterate that subject, any farther; than to obferve, that, in all probability, the dispersion of the German Ranters, was the fource of English Anabaptism. For, very foon after the period of their rebellion and ranterism, in Germany, under Fohn of Leyden, and at Amsterdam, under John Geles, aided by that Anabaptifical psuedo-prophet John Matthew; † I say, very soon after tais period, we hear of them in England. Probably the imports were from Holland; a country fertil in hærefy and fchism.

26 About the year 1536, they were subdued and dispersed at Munster and Amsterdam. And in two years after (fays Fuller in his churchhistory) "the name of this fect first appears in our English Chronicles." But their appearance was probably earlier; because, in the very year (1536) in which their dispersion took place in Germany, a convocation of the upper and lower house in London established a protest against their tenets; one article of which runs thus, "The facrament of baptism is offered unto all; as well infants, as those which have the use of reason." - And even so early as the year 1533, Fohn Frith, a martyr, wrote a short tractate,

⁺ This enthusiast fet himself up as a kind of Chief; and, in blasphemous imitation of the Son of Goo, appointed under him twelve ranting hirelings, whom he called the twelve Apolles. They prophesied that the end of the world was to take place in the year 1536, and filled people's heads with many other Atrange reveries. intitled, intitled, a declaration of baptism; in which he fays, "There is an opinion risen among some, who affirm, that children may not be baptized, 'till they come to perfect age. But verily, methinks, they are far from the meekness of Christ and his Spirit; who, when children were brought unto him, received 'em lovingly, &c. — But this matter I will pass over; for I trust the English, to whom I write, have no such opinions."

If this honest Martyr cou'd have but taken a peep at the state of things in the middle of the last century; how wou'd he have been astonished at the rapid growth of Anabaptism, under the friendly auspices of Oliver Cromwell! For a confiderable time, the Anabaptists were extremely enamored with the canting Usurper; in whose levelling cause numbers of them even took up arms, and were accessary to the shedding innocent blood. Yet when the tables were turned: when death turned over Oliver to the tribunal of God, to give an account there for his usurpation and hypocrify: and when Divine Providence placed upon the throne the rightful heir of the unhappy Monarch, who had been cut off by the bloody hand of tyranny, independency and usurpation. - I fay, when matters took this turn; lo! all of a fudden the very persons who but lately canted to Cromwell, now cant to Charles; they rake up the ashes of the deceased Usurper, and firew his grave with the fweet flowers of an anothema; execrating his memory, and in their their address to the King, calling him "loathfome Hypocrite, grand Impostor, detestable Traytor, treacherous Usurper, Prodigy of nature, &c. &c."— That Cromwell MERITED these epithets of infamy, there is no doubt: but, whether they come with any tolerable grace from those, who had been so very lately his sanguinary associates in the "GOOD OLD CAUSE," the judicious reader is to determine.

I ask your pardon, Sir, for this little digression; which was, in some measure, suggested by the thread of my subject. I am far from intimating here, that the modern advocates for Anabaptism, are any more like the canting friends of Oliver, than the mad adhærents of John of Leyden; and I wou'd hope too, that they as cordially execrate the proceedings of the Ufurper, as their forefathers; who in a poenitential fit, styled him the "GRAND IMPOSTOR." Yet, permit me to observe, that the part, which some take, in vindicating the American rebellion, and opposing the equitable claims of the Mothercountry, favors a little of the "GOOD OLD CAUSE." And I think, I may fafely affirm that, if the spirit of rebellious discord, which now operates fo dreadfully among the provincial male-contents, and is ventilated by a few inflammatory patriots at home, were to arrive at its full meridian; our eyes wou'd foon behold a restoration of the "GOOD OLD CAUSE" of civil and ecclefiaftical anarchy, republican independency, to-2 P gether gether with all the other spawn of Oliverian usurpation. And I cannot help faying too, that. confidering the innumerable privileges this land of liberty enjoys, under the auspices of one of the most amiable Princes, that ever swayed the British sceptre; to affert any thing, that has a tendency to rob him of his legal prerogative over any branch of his dependent subjects, is very ungrateful, to fay nothing worse: and therefore, it wou'd be more becoming in some, both, as christians and subjects, to keep their private opinions, respecting the present troubles, to themfelves; than to be continually stuffing our public papers, with paragraphs, which only add oil to the flame, which burns too vehemently already. Si non satis SUA SPONTE infaniunt INSTIGA. -

But, to return to my subject - I think it must now appear manifest to every person of candor and differnment, that however Anabaptism may boast of Petrobrusian, it cannot, of British antiquity: fince, before the beginning of the fixteenth century, the name was hardly known in England. And, that it has not the fanction of the primitive church, I hope has been made equally evident. I might add too, that Anabaptism never had the usage of any national church for its support; but that, on the contrary, every reformed church throughout Europe admits of

IV. Permit me to ask your opinion, Sir, refpecting the arguments I have adopted, and the authorities I have produced, in support of the controverted point. If you are open to conviction, and accessible to truth, I think they must stagger you a little. At least I would hope, they will prove, that your opponents have jomething to say for themselves, in savor of infant-baptism; and that too, on the ground of scripture, antiquity and reason: so that, altho' we disclaim being infallible, yet we might venture to be as positive as you, upon this subject. But it is upon solid argument, not on positive assertions, that we rest the matter.

Wall, in the preface to his history of infant-baptism, relates a very remarkable anecdote concerning a person of distinction among the Anabaptists. The original author of the story, is Cassander.—The respectable Anabaptist, reserved to, had imbibed the prejudices of his brethren against infant-baptism. However, being a person of candor and moderation, he listened to the arguments of the Padobaptists. And, when the opinion of the primitive fathers was laid before him, he was so swayed by their united testimonies, that he relinquished his former prejudices, and commenced an advocate for infant-baptism.

15 This happened in him" says Wall, "because he was endued with three good qualities. 1 The fear of God, and reverence for his word. 2 Judgment and good fense. 3 Modesty and a meek temper."

After reading this pleafing little anecdote, I was ready to fay, Go thou, and do likewife. But a retrospect to the peremptory spirit, which lays the foundation of your prejudices stops me from expatiating on the important advice. And I am the more discouraged in pressing the matter, when I reslect on the never-to-be-forgotten answer, which you gave to a friend of mine, when he talked with you on the controverted subject.

The anonymous friend I refer to, proposed to your confideration, the multiplicity of modern witnesses, as well as the general usage of antiquity, as one very probable ground of the right of infant-baptism. To this weighty observation you made the following extraordinary reply. "Then blindness in part is happened to Israel!" I am forry to be under the necessity of telling you, Sir, that your answer was by no means tinctured with either that modesty or charity, which should always characterize the christian, and diffinguish the man of candor; especially when he gives his opinion upon points of doubtful difputation; and points too, which have the fanction of all the national churches in Europe, and of fome of the brightest " MORNING-STARS of the Reformation." Your

Your memorable reply affords another specimen of your mode of applying scripture; for, scripture indeed it is throughout, though in a state of notorious misapplication. Let us take a view of it in its primary reference.—The passage is in Rom. ii. 25, and is applied to the state of the rejected Jews, of whom the Apostle says ver. 8, "God hath given them the spirit of slumber; "eyes that they should not see, &c." And after contrasting the privileged state of the Gentiles to the deplorable condition of the Jews, the Apostle addresses the former, saying, "I wou'd not, "brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this "mystery, that blindness in part is happened to "Israel."

This fcripture, then, which is manifeftly declarative of the most confirmed blindness and horrible infatuation of the Jews, you thought proper to quote, as an apology for those, who admit the right of infant-baptism. I know Sir, you and your friends are extremely fond of recommending adult-immersion under the pompous title of a revelation. And, to be sure, if it really merits that title; those, to whom a matter of such importance is not revealed, must be under the influence of a sad envelopment indeed.

But it is very odd, Sir, that prodigious numbers of ancient and modern christians should have their eyes opened to the deep things of God; and yet never see the importance of adult-dipping. It is equally extraordinary, that that light which

maketh manifest, has never enabled some of the brightest ornaments of truth to discover, that infant-baptism is a mere unscriptural nullity, as you infinuate.

Besides; if adult-baptism be "essential to the obedience of faith;" how shall we account for innumerable multitudes of believers; living and dying without this anabaptistic ESSENTIAL?

When you brought the charge of "blindness" against those who differ from you, did you maturely confider what venerable authorities it affected? According to your ideas, some of the most pure national churches, as well as the most illustrious fathers, martyrs, confessors, minifters, must have been all blind! So that (1) all the fathers of the four first centuries unfortunately fall under this predicament, viz. Irenœus; Clement; Justin Martyr; Origen; Ambrose; Cyprian; Chrysoftom; Hierom; Augustin, and all the managers of the pelagian controversy; the feveral famous councils of Carthage; in the first of which there were no less than 66 Bishops, with Cyprian at their head. All these venerable fathers and councils, who unanimously joined in admitting infant-baptism, must have been, upon your principle, all blind.

(2) As even the Anabaptists themselves acknowledge that "the authority of Augustin carried the baptism of infants without controul," from the commencement of the pelagian controversy to the origin of the Waldenses, which in-

confequently all the churches, councils, fathers, ministers and people, during that long space of time, must have been all blind.

- (3) The general body of the Waldenses, both ancient and modern, who, (except a few fpurious sectaries among them) admit infant-baptism, must be all blind.
- (4) All the illustrious Reformers, Martyrs, Confessors in our excellent national church, from Wickliff of immortal memory to the present day, must have been all blind. Those burning and thining lights, the inftruments of Reformation, that florished in the reign of King Edward VI. and were extinguished under the bloody auspices of Queen Mary; these too must be included among the blind advocates for infant-baptism. Suppose I mention a few of the venerable names of the Confessors, Reformers, Martyrs, Ministers; who all were unanimous upon the fubject in debate. - Bede, Wickliff, Bradwardin; Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, Hooper, Bradford, Philpot, Abbot, Grindal, Parker, Whitgift, Hall, Davenant, Downham, Carlton, Beveridge, Hervey, &c. &c. &c.
- (5) The great continental Reformers must have been in the same plight, viz. Huss, Jerom of Prague, Luther, Calvin, Bucer, Peter Martyr, Beza, &c.
- (6) The church of Scotland, in whose communion there have been, and still are, men of the deepest piety and learning, has always admitted infant-infant-baptism, from the very first dawn of its establishment. I might here too produce a long list of venerable names; but shall content myfelf with only mentioning those of the seraphic Watts, and the judicious and deeply-learned Doddridge.

(7) To these I might add the usage of the church of Ireland, in which Usher and Hopkins shine as stars of the first magnitude. — And to these I might super-add the testimony of various eminent gospel-ministers, in the present day, both in the establishment and among the disfenters; whose piety, orthodoxy and learning, stamp reverence on their characters, and give weight to their authority. And I cannot help thinking, that some of the venerable names I have mentioned, were as free from the just charge of blindness, as any men that ever lived; and as persectly conversant in the system of spiritual optics, as the most sagacious Anabaptist, whether ancient or modern.

From hence it is evident, that your imputation of blindness, is calculated to throw a dark shade upon the characters of the primitive Fathers; upon the decisions of the most venerable Councils; upon the opinion of a "Noble army of Martyrs;" upon the names of the most illustrious Reformers; and upon the general usage of all the national protestant churches throughout the world. Well, Sir, the catalogue of these respectable and venerable authorities, authorities, shines in my eye, with such lustre, and sways my partiality to such a degree; that I am ready to adopt the sanguine declaration of the young man in Cicero; "Errare malo cum Platone, quam cum istis VERA sentire!"

But your reflection of blindness tends likewise to inflate the minds of your brethren with self-conceit; and, while you harangue upon the "blindness" of others, it is natural for them to think, that the Anabaptists are the men, and that wisdom must die with them. And yet, what shou'd induce you to think the Anabaptists are infallible opticians on the subject of baptism, I cannot tell; unless such infallibility be founded on a retrospect to the whimsical Tertullianists, the impure Cathari, the sectarian followers of the Petrobrusians, the German Ranters, or the canting adhærents of Oliver Cromwell.

I have ever observed, that, a conceit of superior eye-sight even in non-essentials, lays the soundation, not only of spiritual pride, but likewise of uncharitable bigotry. My observation is warranted by facts; and a recent instance confirms me in my opinion.—A pious woman, a member of "the church" of the Anabaptists, had a desire to attend the lectures of a gospelminister in the established church. Her attendance gave considerable disgust to her brethren; but more especially to her pastor, who gravely summoned her before him; and with all the pomp of dictatorial dignity, thus addressed the poor delinquent, " How can you go to fuch a place? when by your going, you countenance those cursed TRADITIONS!" The honest woman had too much fortitude and fimplicity to be intimidated by this menacing address; and therefore still attends the gospel in the church of England, notwithstanding the curje which this Gentleman has thought proper to affix to its institutions. I wish, when Anabaptists imitate this anathematizer in lording it over the consciences of their people; that the people, so lorded-over, wou'd affert their freedom, and act like the pious woman just mentioned. For, let me tell you, Sir, that neither you, nor any fet of men upon earth, have any fcriptural right to draw a circle round the people of God, and to circumscribe their hearing and communicating within the narrow prœcincts of your own party; especially when fuch conduct glaringly implies, that no community of christians merit the name of "the church," for purity either of doctrine or discipline, but the Anabaptists.

Say not, I have exaggerated matters here. Daily experience proves, I have not. The spirit of the Anabaptist-minister, who could style the excellent liturgical services of our church "cursed traditions," is too frequently exemplified in others. Such illiberal abuse of our church is no new thing. But whether such low invectives characterize the christian, or the gentleman, I fancy one of a very moderate share of discernment, may easily easily determine. And if, to issue out anathemas against dissering brethren, and to distinguish their public services by the bitter epithet of "cursed traditions" be an essential ingredient of the church, I pray God that I may live and die without it.

The fact, which I have adverted to, was told me by the fuffering party; and I can eafily credit the particulars of it, from the spirit, which her arraigner has displayed upon other occasions; as well as from the veracity and piety of the furerer. But the fufferings of this poor woman were flight when compared with the fate of others. Is it not a matter of general notoriety that fimilar delinquents have undergone the fevere fentence of a formal excommunication; when to their hearing of a gospel-minister in the church of England, they have likewife added the great crime of communicating with him too. I must in justice acknowledge, that this conduct is not adopted by all the Anabaptists. I myself have the pleasure of knowing one, who, notwithstanding his peculiar sentiments, favors even the "curfed traditions" with his attendance, and does not think himself polluted, in partaking of the Lord's supper with his brethren in the establishment. Such conduct, however blamed by " the church" does honor to catholicism, christianity, candor, and good sense.

But, it is with real concern I fpeak it, that all are not equally candid and catholic. For, besides the specimens of bigotry I have already charged upon them; is it not a fact, that Anabaptist-

ministers make reprifals upon the congregations of others, to the diffurbance of the flock, and the annoyance of the pastor that presides over it? As foon as any poor finners are awakened thro' the instrumentality of a minister of the gospel in the establishment, or among the dissenters; immediately the Anabaptists get about him, and attack his fimplicity upon dipping. The inexperience of the newly-awakened convert, disqualifies him for refishing the few trite arguments, brought in support of immersion; and thus he falls a prey to Anabaptism. From the time he submits to the ceremony he is bound with a cord of discipline, which ties him to Anabaptist communion: and, if gratitude should prompt the convert, to frequent that church, which had been first made a Beth-el to his foul, and to communicate with that beloved minister, who was made his spiritual father in Christ; even this grateful conduct always meets with a discouraging frown from his brethren, and fometimes is judged worthy of expulsion. they! who are expelled for fuch conduct.

I again fay, that I do not exaggerate. Various ministers of the gospel in the present day complain of the annoyance of bigoted Anabaptists; and with deep concern lament, that some of their hearers, who were remarkable for simplicity and love, after being proselyted to Anabaptism, have commenced intolerably petulant, bigoted, and severe; and, instead of recommending the gospel of Christ by word and deed, acquire a little forward ward cant about dipping, which they press upon the Lord's people, with as much positive eagerness as if it were "essential to the obedience of faith." And indeed I myself have seen a few instances of some warm-hearted professors, the life of whose souls, was so essectually dead and buried in their "watery grave;" that considering the keen anxiety, which incidents of this nature occasion to a conscientious minister of the gospel; I cannot help adverting to the selicity of that parish-priess, the negative tranquillity of whose parochial charge is thus described,

Some Pædobaptists, in a pang of refentment for ungenerous captures made among their flocks, have sometimes given such anabaptistic reprisals the severe epithet of "sheep-stealing." Though I by no means approve of such a severe and sarcastic phrase; I cannot help confessing, however, that the conduct of some has given too visible ground for such a reslection. In order to evade the force of such a charge, it has been urged by some Anabaptists, that although "they are sheep-stealers, yet they are not sheep-starvers." But this apology is as weak and evasive, as the conduct, upon which it is often sounded; and the apologists themselves would be wise never to adopt it henceforth, for the following reasons. (1) They inadvertently allow the charge brought against them. (2) Their apology is founded upon an evafion, that never was admitted even in the most corrupt court of judicature. If a felon at the bar, clearly convicted of sheep-stealing, shou'd attempt to apologize for his villainy, by urging, that "although he fole the sheep, yet he did not farve it;" wou'd any judge or jury pay the least attention to such an evasive plea? Or, wou'd the plumpness of the stolen animal rescue the offender from condign punishment? (3) Do the Anabaptists never commit depredations but upon lean pastures? I fancy, many instances might be produced, where the pastures were as fresh and falutary, the shepherds as skilful and laborious, and the sheep as plump and healthy, as any ever boasted of in the Anabaptist communion. The truth is, Sir, your brethren delight most in invading the fattest pastures, and in making leizures, not of wild goats, but of goats transformed into harmless well-fed sheep. Query, whether after being shut up in an Anabaptist enclosure, fuch sheep look, either so plump or healthy, as when they enjoyed an uncontrouled range over the fertilized and luxuriant fields of catholic liberty. Rather, do they not acquire the ema-ciated look of Pharaoh's lean kine? And does not their very appearance point out the necessity of fuffering them to have access to those streams, where they first slaked their thirst; and to visit those green pastures, from whence they first derived derived their nutriment, and acquired their obefity? Sure, it is not finful to wish, that sheep in fuch pining circumstances, may burst the barrier; of bigotry, and fpring from an unnatural, uncatholic, and unreasonable enclosure.

But the grand apology, which you and your brethren make for your frequent incroachments on the pastures of other shepherds, is; that you think it effentially conducive to the health and prefervation of the sheep that they should be once dipt. Hence, in your late fermon, preparatory to that ceremony, you faid, "dipping is effential to the obedience of faith, tho' not to falvation." Here you feem to point out a distinction, and to urge a conciliatory falvo, for the emphatic firefs you lay on dipping. But, before I have dismissed my observations on this subject, I hope I shall make it appear, that your distinction is no real distinction at all; and that the salvo proposed, so far from conciliating our veneration for anabaptism, rather excites our detestation; as for a futil fomething that assumes an air of essentiality and importance, like the great Diana of the Ephesians, or an infallible bull from the Mother of abominations.

(1) I have feveral times expressed my astonishment and difgust at your mode of applying scripture; and am forry to be under a necessity of doing it again. The obedience of faith is certainly a fcriptural phrase; but as you have pressed it into the fervice of Anabaptism, it wears the appearance of a member in a state of dislocation; of a valuable stone wrenched from an elegant edifice, to adorn some poor clay-built hut; or of a precious jewel suspended from a garment of

Judicious christians, Sir, look upon an innumerable multitude of dippings, as so many cyphers. But you do well to aggrandize them, by præfixing a scriptural unit. For this, at the head of absolute cyphers, gives them importance, and converts them into hundreds and thousands. However, if you remove the scripture præfix, your cyphers resume their primitive nothingness, and are cyphers still. We think then, that dipping is a mere unimportant cypher; and that to affirm it is "essential to the obedience of faith" reminds us of the pygmy, who perched upon the giant's shoulder, that by such an elevated situation, he might aggrandize his liliputian insignissicance. But

And anabaptism is a cypher, a non-essential still, though all the advocates in the world were to proclaim its essentiality. I will endeavor to pull down the pygmy from its aspiring situation, and expose both its nothingness and pride.

(2) The obedience of faith, or obedience to the faith among all nations, are expressions, that occur in Rom. i. 5, and xvi. 26. Both passages imply that obedience, which faith gives, in crediting the gospel-offer of salvation; and which it performs, in walking according to its prescribed rules. This obedience of faith is made known to ALL NATIONS, in the unlimited and universal promulgation of the gospel; which calls upon all, Jews and Gentiles, to believe and obey. If you ask then, what I think the scriptures make essential to the obedience of faith; I answer, simply believing upon Christ, to the exclusion of every felf-righteous plea; and obeying the truth in love, in contra-distinction to antinomian licentiousness. Thus the recumbency of the foul on Christ alone for pardon and peace, and an imitation of that immaculate Redeemer in righteousness and true holiness, constitute the two grand branches, which grow from the root of living faith, and which are absolutely necessary to discriminate the prosperous planting of the Lord from barren rotten-hearted cumber-grounds.

Although the clear and evangelical declaration of the obedience, which faith demands, was "a mystery, which was kept secret since the world began; Rom. xvi. 25, yet that declaration, as to the essence of it, was made even so early as in the days of Abraham; for God "preached the gospel" to him. And it was because of the Patriarch's illustrious submission to the obedience of faith, that he acquired the distinguishing title of the father of the faithful. His interest in the covernant made his children confederate, and give them a right to the seal of circumcision. But this ordinance was so far from being an essential in his obedience of faith, that both his faith and ebedience existed many years, before he was circumcifed. Besides, if circumcision had been an essential, what must have been the sate of all women and of all infants dying before the eighth day?

(3) I have already proved that dipping is not essential to the mode of administering baptism. And that adult-dipping is no part of the essence of obedient faith, is abundantly plain, if we confider, (1) that even in adults converted from judaisim or infidelity, obedient faith ought to precede baptism. So when the awakened jailor demanded what he must do to be faved; the Apostles preached the effence of obedient faith, faying, " Believe on the LORD Jesus Christ." And then baptism, the noneffential followed lafter. (2) If adult-dipping be an essential; then what must be the case of myriads of believers, and thousands of ministers, who lived and died without this effential? (3) Is not the Spirit given to the church of Christ, to lead into all effential truth? Is there any doubt but a countless multitude of persons, baptized in infancy, have been under a divine influence? If therefore adult-dipping were an effential, wou'd not the Spirit of truth have made them acquainted with it? (4) If profound learning, acute reasoning, acquaintance with the oriental languages, knowledge of church-history, deep piety, and obedience to the faith even unto death, be under God, fuccessful means of investigating essential truth; have not the advocates for infant-baptism a confiderable majority of illustrious witnesses endowed with these excellent qualifications? (5) If adult-dipping, or baptism at all, were an essential; shou'd not our Lord have released the penitent thief from his confinement on the cross, and shou'd he not have baptized him, before his departure from the body? Yet our Lord dismissed him without the Anabaptists, essential; and received him to glory without it too.

(4) I have often had my fears, that there was fome affinity between the spirit of ancient judaism and modern anabaptism: and I am now fully convinced my apprehensions were not altogether groundless. The judaizing teachers, that annoyed the once-florishing church of Galatia, seem to have recommended circumcifion in the style of an effential, just as the Anabaptists urge dipping now. See the parrallel between the one and the otherthe judaizing bigots attacked those that were established in the obedience of faith: so do the Anabaptists in the present day — The molestation of the judaizing teachers, spread confusion, difcord, and altercation throughout the once-peaceful church of Galatia: and many happy and united congregations have made a dreadful exchange of the fweets of peace for the bitterness of strife, upon the intrusion of Anabaptism - A spirit of legality urged circumcifion; the fame spirit is deeply at the bottom of Anabaptism.—The judaizing teachers firuck at the glory of the gospel: fo do the Anabaptists, when they say dipping is " effential to the obedience of faith."

(5) But,

(5) But, in order to evade the force of this last charge, you cry out, "O but, we do not fay that adult-dipping is effential to falvation." No, Sir? Not when you fay it is " effential to the obedience of faith? Surely, if obedient faith be effential to falvation; whatever constitutes its effence must, by unavoidable confequence, include the effentiality of salvation. So that your distinction, salvo, or call it what you please, is nothing but a compound of evafion and nonfense; and only serves as a deceptive varnish to hide the deformity of anabaptism.-If your mode of making distinctions were adopted upon innumerable subjects, it would draw after it a chain of innumerable abfurdities. Suppose, Sir, that a professor of anatomy in the course of his anatomical lectures, should lay down the following thesis, viz. that the office of respiration in the lungs, and the process of circulating the blood by the reciprocal operation of the systole and diaffole, or the contraction and dilatation of the heart, were effential to the health of an individual, but not to the preservation of his life; would not the lowest graduate in anatomy smile at the diffinction? and fuspect, that his lecturer needed a little instruction himself, on the obvious and natural connection fubfifting between the effential operation of any thing, and the effential end, to which it leads. Obedient faith is in the foul, what the systole and diastole are in the body. The contraction of the one, and the diffusive dilatation of the other, illustrate the distinct, yet combined acts of believing and obeying. The respective and mutual operations of the sormer are essential to health and the preservation of life: and the inseperable duty of the latter is essentially conducive to the soul's prosperity and salvation. This is essential in the one case; that in the other. Therefore, an anatomist, might, with as good a grace, maintain, that a dash of water against the stomach would supply the place of the respective sunctions of the lungs and heart in the animal economy; as an anabaptist affert, that adult dipping is an

Permit me to point out the abfurdity of your distinction in another familiar illustration. - Suppose that his Majesty's Plenipotentiary in America, shou'd issue out a proclamation in the King's name; offering the provincial infurgents a free pardon, together with a restoration of all the privileges, of which their rebellion juftly deprived them; yet suspending the pardon and the other royal favors on the effential fine-quânon of their throwing down their arms, and admitting the equitable claims of the mothercountry; proclaiming, that a fuspension of their rebellious infurrection wou'd be effential, as well to their obedient fealty to his Majesty, as to their preservation from the sword of justice; and that the royal favor shou'd be ratified to every obedient provincial by the broad-feal of England. - Now, Sir, what is the effential here? Is it the subsequent feal, or the antecedent fubmission of the fubiect?

fubject? Wou'd not to affert the former, incur an egregious hysteron proteron? And, if any perfon shou'd urge, that, although a cessation from treasonable hostilities was essential to the obedient fealty of the subject, but not to his future preservation from incensed justice; wou'd not every man of common sense laugh at the ridiculous resinement? and set down the author of it, as a novice, or an enemy to the true interest of the deluded provincials? The application is easy.

Having exposed the weakness, fallacy, and absurdity of your distinction, permit me to observe therefore, that to say, "adult-dipping is effential to the obedience of faith, but not to salvation," is exactly the same as to affert that "dipping is essential to salvation, but not to

And now, O professor of the gospel, I turn, from the zealous advocate for the essentiality of dipping, to thee: And, my earnest appeal addresses your piety, candor, reason, and common sense. Do you not perceive, that Anabaptism has now fairly thrown aside the mask, and discovered its long-concealed visage? Perhaps you thought, (with myself) that the gospel was stamped on every feature of its face; but if you look narrowly, you may easily discover the lineaments of legality portrayed there. An Anabaptist minister publicly declares that "dipping is essential to the obedience of faith." His brethren hear and applaud the declaration: and in the mouth of two or three Anabaptist witnesses, every word of the aforesaid declaration has been vindicated and established. I ask then, whether such preaching does not favor strongly of that judaizing leaven, which corrupted the gospel, and spread a ferment among its abettors, at Galatia. - The legal advocates for circumcifion, preffed that ordinance, as effential: the Anabaptists give dipping the same important title. - The great Apostle of the Gentiles called the fystem of the judaizing bigots, another gospel: and Anabaptism merits the fame appellation, fince it lays claim to effentiality.

— If Paul were now alive, he wou'd address the Anabaptists, as once he did the Galatian bigots, " If ye be circumcised (dipped) Christ shall profit you nothing." q. d. If ye submit to dipping, and esteem it an essential in obedient faith, ye shall receive no benefit from the righteousness or Spirit of Christ; because, "in Christ Jesus, neither circumcifion availeth any thing, nor uncircumcifion, (but the grand effential) faith, which worketh by love." - No wonder that Anabaptists infift on dipping: the fecret is unravelled; dipping's an effential. And no wonder if such an effential topic constitute an effential part of Anabaptist ministers discourses.—O professor, beware of fuch preaching. If you do not look fimply to Christ, and fearch his word, your foul will be enfnared. If your confcience is alarmed with the law, and galled with the sense of guilt, you will be ready to catch at any thing, that might give give it peace: And if you are told that "dipping is an effential," the legal bias of your heart will fuck in the poison; your wounds will be healed. flightly; your peace will be a false one; your fpirit, instead of being thrown into a gospel mould, will imbibe that four bigotry, which is the diffinguishing characteristic of a party; and, if you rest in dipping, without having previously obtained that fweet rest, which obedient faith communicates, you may fettle upon your lees, become twice dead, and at last be plucked up by the roots, as a rotten blafted fig-tree. — If you are one of those, who think it their duty to be dipped, I have no objection to the speedy. removal of your fcruples on that head. Only take care that the "watery grave" does not give you cold; does not destroy the simplicity and warmth of your heart, now glowing perhaps with the love of Christ. If you are not in Christ, you may go to the bath, and go to hell too: All the water in fordan, or in the Ocean, will not fave you from destruction, if your heart benot washed from an evil conscience by the blood of sprinkling. — If you have been baptized in infancy, listen to no proposals on the subject of re-baptism. Did you ever read of an individual under the law, that was circumcifed a fecond time, though admitted to that rite in infancy? The Anabaptists, like the judaizing teachers, want to dip you, that they might glory in your flesh. And when once they do, depend upon it, they will

will make it a point that you shou'd communicate with them only. And will you thus refign your christian freedom, and bury your glorious liberty in the Anabaptist's " watery grave?" O profesior, stand upon your guard. Be vigilant: Watch against Satan, especially when he transforms himfelf into an angel of light. And, left you shou'd take either a legal or an antinomian nap in your important post on the christian watch-tower, take the following WATCH-WORD, bind it about your neck, and write it on the tables of your heart, viz: "He is not a Jew (nor a Christian) which is one outwardly, neither is that (the true) circumcifion" (or the true baptism) " which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew" (or a Christian) "which is one inwardly: and circumcifion is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of Gop." Rom. ii. 28, 29.

I now turn, from the un-wary, the un-established or the legal professor, to you, Sir. Perhaps you will think my last address was too fevere. It was feverity founded on scriptural truth, and warranted by stubborn facts; and therefore requires no apology. - But I hasten to a conclusion.

Throughout this pamphlet I have taken frequent opportunities to make honorable mention of the established church. Yet I am not so far under the influence of partiality or bigotry, as to suppose, she is infallible. This is the pompous cha-2 S

racteristic of that anti-christian church which proudly boasts it cannot err. And, if any other church be perfectly free from spots, it is welcome to cast the first stone at ours. Considering, out of what a horrible flate of popith and heathenith darkness our church arose, the matter of aftonishment is, not, that she has any fpots, but that she has not many more. She had lien among the pots - in a state of accumulated guilt and abominable fuperstition in mystic Babylon; till the light of reformation penetrated the Ægyptian gloom, and the hand of almighty grace extricated her from her bondage. Since that glorious period, she hath shone bright as the wings of the dove, whose wings are covered with filver, and her feathers with gold; and though the robe of truth, with which she is adorned, be here and there a little fullied with the flight remains of that darkness, from whence she emerged; yet this no more really affects her facred vesture, than a few spots of dirt wou'd take from the richness of a garment of embroidery, or a slight blemish deform a well-proportioned set of features. What I call spots in our church, might be more properly styled redundant appendages: which, like the fringes on the Ifraelites' garments, are as far from being ornamental, as they are from being really useful; and yet which do not in the least detract from the purity of that bright reformation-robe, wherewith our venerable Alma Mater is arrayed.

When therefore you take a view of our excellent church, let it not be through the magnifying glass of party-prejudice, but through the amiable optic of tenderness and love. Then you will

> Be to her faults a little blind, And to her virtues very kind.

Confident I am, Sir, that although you, and all the Anabaptists in the world, unite in branding the fervices of our church with the odious stigma of "cursed traditions;" yet God will bless them. And the judicious fons of the establishment no more dread the influence of a curse, either upon themselves or their ministrations, from a bigoted Anabaptist-teacher; than Luther of old regarded the futil anathema of a bigoted Pope's bull, when he called it "bulla, veré bullarum filia!" * That God, who hath bleffed our excellent church in old time, still continues his blessing; and will continue it, I trust, as long as the fun and moon endure. Various efforts have Rome and Satan made to crush her to nothing; yet she has always rifen superior to their confederate affaults, and, like the palmtree, hath florished the more for pressure. Although she was cast into the scorching slames of Marian persecution; yet, like another phoenix, Ex SEIPSA RENASCITUR, she acquired life from the fire, and emerged from the martyrial ashes, brighter and more glorious. Even the "academic death" has proved eventual life; and given birth to numerous living witnesses. So that, when our church has been wounded by the hand of perfecution. God hath come down upon her with his bleffing, like rain upon the mown grass, and made her spring the more rapidly, after the mowings of the persecuting fcythe. Even in these present days of blasphemy and reproach, her interests florith. number of her ecclefiaftical and truly-evangelical fons is amazingly multiplied. May their zeal and fuccess increase with their multiplication! May the LORD God of hofts go forth with them. when they go forth against the common enemy! May the great Captain of our falvation endue them with undaunted resolution in the cause of God and truth! May they be made polished shafts in Jehovah's quiver! And may the arms of their hands be made strong by the almighty God of Jacob! May their ministerial rod, blossom, and bring forth much fruit! May they be burning and thining lights! burning with inextinguishable zeal in their great Master's cause, and shining with the diffusive light of doctrinal and practical truth! When they are fometimes bowed down with the greatness of their work; may they be reanimated with the greatness of their reward! And, whether they blow the gospel-trump, in the high-ways and hedges; or feed the flock of Christ in a more confined sphere of action; whether they are itinerant evangelists, or local pastors; may the LORD God Omnipotent preserve them as stars in his right hand, from the evil of fin, and the delufions of 107 1 error!

error! Yea whether they are distinguished by the name of Churchman or Dissenter; may the blessing of the God of Abraham follow them, as far as they follow Christ! And make them an embodied phalanx against the strong-holds of Satan!

Give them thy strength, thou God of pow'r; Then let men rage, or devils roar: Thy faithful witnesses they'll be: 'Tis fix'd — they can do all through THEE.

Such, Sir, are the genuine ejaculations of a heart, deeply interested in the welfare of our British Zion; and yet expanded in benevolent and catholic love to you, and to all, throughout the world, who love the LORD Fesus Christ in fincerity. My heart's defire and prayer to God is, that the interests of the gospel may be univerfally extensive; without regarding who are. the highly-favored instruments in its propagation. Whoever the men are, or by whatever name they may be distinguished, if they urge obedient faith, they shall be most heartily welcome to my right hand of cordial fellowship. But if you, or any person else, quantusquantus sit, attempt to aggrandize disputed ceremonies into essentials; I shall think it as much my duty to oppose you. as ever Paul did, the judaizing diffurbers of the church of Galatia.

In order then that a minister's public work may be really useful to the church, and acceptable to God; wou'd it not be well to consider and digest, out of many, the few following particulars?

ticulars? (1) Shou'd not the glory of God in the promulgation of the gospel, be a minister's grand, primary object?

(2) Next to the divine glory, shou'd he not principally regard the falvation of lost souls, without squinting at a bigoted proselytism to his own party?

(3) Shou'd not the great aim of his public discourses, and private demeanor, be, to humble the sinner, exalt the Saviour, and promote holiness? And is not every other topic compared with this, trivial, inferior, and non-essential?

(4) Is it not incumbent upon every well-wisher to the prosperity of Zion, to pull down, as far as may be, the partition-walls of bigotry, and ceremonial attachment, by urging the great truth of the poet, in the following striking appeal?

Ye diff'ring fects, who all declare, "Lo! here is Christ; or lo! he's there;" Your stronger proofs divinely give, And shew me where the christians LIVE.

(5) Shou'd not every embassador of the Prince of peace, copy after that pacific original, in word and deed? Shou'd not every minister preach peace, (especially during the present troubles) both in a civil and religious point of view? by recommending to all, to "render unto Casar the things that are Casar's; and unto God, the things that are God's?"

(6) Ought

(6) Ought not every friend in the cause of truth, to brandish the weapons of his warfare against sin? as that monster is always at the bottom of national wars and fightings, as well as the primum mobile in every private broil. Would not Anabaptist-ministers therefore be better employed in attacking sin, than in publishing pamphlets, which have an indirect tendency to increase the workings of that hydra, in the multisarious rebellion of restless Americans? And wou'd not you, Sir, have done more service to the cause of truth, if, instead of ridiculing those who differ from you on the subject of infant-baptism, you had,

The fins of the world in general, and of the church in particular, might afford you an ample field to expatiate in : and it is hard to tell, whether the follies of the one merit more Democritus's facetious fneers, than the fins of the other require Heraclitus's lamenting tears. I'm fure, Sir, the divided fituation of your own party in this town, called aloud for the tears both of the tender-hearted philosopher, and the weeping prophet: while that accurfed spirit of bitterness which has rent "the church" here, and fubdivided it in fuch a manner, that the member of one subdivision will hardly speak to a member of the other, if he meet him in the street, demands a cutting reproof. O Sir, how much more effential to the obedence of faith is it to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, 13

than to be dipt! Is it not to be feared that if the religion of some bitter disciples were stript of its fiery zeal for an unfelt fystem of doctrines, and for the unimportant ceremony of dipping, it wou'd be stript of its great all? And that the zealots themfelves wou'd appear as naked as unbaptized heathens? O Sir, if you knew this town, even the professing part of it, as well as others;—how much religious gossiping prevails, instead of christian fellowship; what perpetual tattling, whispering, canting, whining, fupply the place of religious conversation; -how exceedingly inquisitive certain bufy-bodies are into the domestic and spiritual affairs of others, while they too glaringly neglect an examination of their own hearts; -how boldly fome will even fabricate a clandestine lye, and that, in order to fow the feeds of diffension between intimate friends; with what mischievous flyness, these religious incendiaries can carry about a budget of falthoods and mifrepresentations; and how dexterously they can open its contents, even though it be like Pandora's box; -and with what effrontery they can shew themfelves at our religious affemblies, in a mask, that cannot conceal their deformity, even from the eye of man; with what curiofity they enquire into every body's state, but their own;how ready to magnify the peccadillos of another, while they advert not to their own monstrous inconfishencies;—and by what artful machinations these religious sirebrands labor to set the church in a flame;—I fay, Sir, if you were acquainted with these particulars; I am sure, instead of urging immersion as essential to the obedience of faith, you wou'd have called aloud to S——n professors, to walk even as Christ also walked; in humility, tenderness, truth, and love.

Praying that you may fight the good fight of obedient faith, and finish your ministerial course with exceeding great joy and extensive success. I remain,

Your affectionate brother and humble adhærent to "one Lord, one faith, ONE BAPTISM:"

TEFORE the conclusive part of my Letter to a Baptist Minister, &c. was printed off, I sent a friendly line to Mr. P. a member of the Anabaptists in this town, requesting he would inform me, whether Mr. M. faid that " adult immersion is essential to the obedience of faith;" at the fame time ingenuously acquainting him; that I had in the press, a treatise on the scrips ture-ground of infant-baptifin, and that therein " I took the liberty to animadvert on the fentiments of the Anabaptists in general, and of Mr. M. in particular;" but wished, before I concluded my pamphlet, to know from Mr. P. whether Mr. M. did really use the above-mentioned strong expression. My inquiry was anfwered in the affirmative, and Mr. M.'s unforiptural declaration, respecting the essentiality of dipping, has been fince vindicated and confirmed by another Anabaptist-minister.

The ingenuous and friendly letter I fent Mr. P. immediately produced a hasty, un-digested little performance, intitled, "An Address to the Members of the Baptist-Church, meeting in High-street, Shrews-bury." The manuscript of this futil publication was written not only before my pamphlet was out, but even before an advertisement was inserted in the Shrewsbury paper to announce its future publication. This is a sample of Mr. Pārmenas's precipitation; and this circumstance will serve to convince the candid reader, how peculiarly touchy and inflammable the mind of an Anabaptist is, when even a distant and un-published opposition to his favorite tenet, will produce such precipitate conduct. As Mr. Parmenas affects to understand latin; before he ever honors "the thurch" with a second address I wou'd advise him to digest well the following concise motto, "Festina lenté;" or that of the Apostle, "Be slow to speak."

to speak." no of But what will excite the affonishment, (and perhaps the rifibility too) of the candid reader, is; the address referred to, was read publicly by Mr. S. on the next Sunday evening in the Anabaptist-meeting, The manifest design of this was to guard the people against the effects of my vindication of infant-baptism, and to convey a fort of intimation that they should not read it. But does not fuch conduct favor too ftrongly of the unfair methods adopted by a certain eroneous church, whose grand interest it is to keep her deluded members in profound ignorance, by pro hibiting a perusal of any books, calculated to refcue them from their fuperstitious bigotry? And I ask too, is it right for the Anabaptists to be continually introducing every little controverfial verfial occurrence into the pulpit? And thus to convert the facred desk into a rostrum of ridicule?

The author of the address is very warm; for he talks of "Satan stirring up those who profess the golpel, to speak evil of, slanderously report, and vilify others." But, who are those evil-speakers, flanderers and vilifiers? Surely, not the persons, who told me, what Mr. P. under his own hand acknowledged to be true. For, if to mention again, what has been delivered in a public manner, be a proof of a man's flandering propenfity, I believe neither Parmenas himself, nor any of his brethren, fland free from the imputation.-And, if the report brought to me from Mr. M.'s public discourses, be true, (which Mr. P. himfelf has acknowledged) does not the charge of flander and evil-speaking, reverberate upon precipitate Parmenas with redoubled force?

The addresser says, "it is our happiness to have the liberty of reading the word of God, and of judging for ourselves; a right to do so, is one of the first principles of nature, and any attempt to deprive us of it, or discovery of resentment and ill-will towards us for the exercise of that right, betrays a narrow spirit, &c." But what does all this pompous complaint mean? Did I ever infinuate, either in public or private, that people shou'd not judge for themselves in reading the word of God? Did I ever make any infringement on the natural right of private judgement? And even, if my pamphlet did contain any infinuation finuation of this kind, yet as it was not published 'till after the address was written; is it not in the highest degree preposterous and ungenerous for Parmenas to throw out severe charges of this kind, which could exist no where but in his own fuspicious and heated imagination? Cou'd, he have but waited 'till my pamphlet was published, he wou'd then have feen my candid fentiments on the right of private judgment; and that fo far from invading that facred prerogative. my whole letter to Mr. M. is founded upon the generous principle which fupports it. An Anabaptist-minister gives his opinion publicly, and feverely too, on the subject of adult-immersion. I, who differ from him on that point, take the liberty to expostulate, and to offer my public opinion on the right of infant-baptifm. Does this public expostulation carry with it the air of " resentment and ill-will?" Or do I mean hereby " any attempt to deprive" the Anabaptists " of the right" of private judgment to which they lay claim? Surely, every person, but precipitate Parmenas, will exculpate me from fuch a charge. And I wou'd hope, that P. himself will do this, after he has read my whole book: in the perufal of which, I have no doubt, but a confcious blulh for his precipitancy on this head, will imperceptibly fleal on his cheek; and that he will in future, pay greater attention to the prophet's words, "He that believeth thall not make hafte."

Parmenas, whose heated imagination has suggested an unfavorable idea of my book, even before he has feen it, fays, "you have more need to pity and pray for the party who maligns you." What! is every person maligned, when his peculiar fentiments are opposed? Then all the controverfialists in the world are a set of maligners. The great Apostle of the gentiles, for his public opposition to Peter, must fall under the lash of the fame fevere predicament. And, though I may be ranked among the maligners too, yet I hope, P. will please to remember, that as Mr. M. began the public maligning of the Pædobaptists, he must consequently be the first maligner. Thus, while P. makes us the objects of his pity and prayers, I shall, in return, fincerely commiserate his equal want of argument and candor. and pray, that a future abatement of his precipitate zeal, may induce him to fix his charge of maligning, flandering, &c. some where else.

P. has aped the motto of my title-page: The first page of my letter presents the reader with two sweet verses from Dr. Wattr, in which that excellent Divine bears his testimony to the right of infant-baptism, as sounded upon the Abrahamic covenant. P. quotes two verses more from the same evangelic Poet, which contain a versification of Rom. vi. 3, 4. Now, as it is upon this scripture, that the Anabaptists chiefly found their plea for dipping; does not the quotation from Dr. Wattr carry with it a kind of infinuation, that he was an advocate for the Anabaptist's " watery grave?" Whereas it is well known, that the Doctor himself, and the whole respectable body of Diffenters, in which he shone as an ornament of diffinguished luftre, always invariably admitted infant-haptism, and that too by affusion or fprinkling. And does not P's attempt to contrast Dr. Watts to himself by imitating my titlepage, imply fomething very unamiable, and remind us of the Poet's exclamation, "O! imitares, servum pecus!" And, fince the Doctor is an explicit advocate for infant-baptifm, and, according to P.'s mode of arguing, a virtual "maligner" of Anabaptism; ought not " the church, meeting in High-street, Shrewsbury," to discard the Doctor's hymn-book, for the fame reason, that they will labor to prohibit their members from reading my Vindication?

The author of the address adopts one argument, such as it is, in favor of adult-immersion, viz: "the testimony of good men in all ages, who have withstood, and steered clear of the general corruption"—nothing. The close of the sentence is neither sense nor grammar. But the judicious reader may perceive what this "incorrect address" wou'd be at. The author of it modestly infinuates, (1) that all the "good men" in sormer and latter days were Anabaptists; (2) that such as were not, did not "steer clear of the general corruption." (3) And that if it were not for "fear, shame, private emoluments, or the shackles

Satis cum imperio! In opposition to all this immodest and groundless cant, I reply; that, if any one will take the trouble carefully to peruse my Vindication, he will immediately perceive that the Fathers for the four first centuries after the Apostolic Æra; all the parties engaged in the pelagian controverfy, which commenced the beginning of the fifth century, including Augustin on the one fide, and Pelagius on the other; all the Fathers, Councils, Ministers, and Professors of Christianity, from the pelagian period, to the beginning of the twelfth century; the body of the illustrious Waldenses; the instruments of the Reformation in Germany, with Luther and Calvin. at their head; all the Reformers in Great-Britain: and all the national reformed churches in Europe. -I fay, any person may perceive from my pamphlet, that all these venerable authorities were unanimous in admitting infant-baptism, and as free from the "general corruption" as any Ana-baptists that ever lived. But on the contrary, I have proved, that Anabaptism, so far from " fleering clear of the general corruption," has, at different periods, failed plump into the dreadful Charybdis. And if Mr. P. would only confult ecclefiaftical history a little, he wou'd abate fome what of his confidence; and find, that no mifcreants upon earth were ever more effectually deluged in the "general corruption" of impiety, ranterism and rebellion, than the Anabaptists in Calvin's days; numbers of whom, with mad fohn of Leyden at their head, committed great outrages at Munster, Amsterdam, &c. And if any one will read the history of Cromwell's usurpation, he will find, that during the blessed reign of the rump, the "general corruption" of bloody independency, reigned as strongly among the Anabaptists, as

Although, P. acknowledges his " address is incorrect," yet as it is "the Lord's work to open blind eyes," he therefore observes that "he sometimes does it by means very unlikely to answer the (end." Here is another modest infinuation, that the advocates for infant-baptism are blind.-Well, if P.'s address shou'd be made the instrument of opening any of our eyes, it wou'd be an illustrious phœnomenon indeed. I must say however, that I never perused a publication in my whole life, more unlikely to answer the defired end of making us all Anabaptifts. For, befides the grammatical inaccuracies of the address, there does not appear the shadow of an argument throughout the whole. Confidering then Parmenas's total disqualification for the important work of vindicating Anabaptism; and that the cause of "the church" is less likely to fuffer from his filence than his publications; he had better in future, call in fome, whom he is pleafed to ftyle es able advocates," and to confine his animada, verfions versions to the narrow limits of his own fire-fide. Since P. is fond of a latin fentence, I will present him with one very apposite to my present observations, Tractent sua fabrilia fabri. Parmenas might thine behind a counter; might cut a tolerable figure in fabricating an important rebus for a news-paper; or in penning a pretty little panegyric on the excellencies of Maria: but I cannot conceive he can ever appear to advantage in forming addresses to "the church;" especially when he assumes the signature of Parmenas; a greek word, which, in all probability, the assumer of it does not understand.

If any of the "able advocates," to whom P. refers, shou'd stand forth in vindication of Anabaptism, I hope they will not attempt to rest the matter upon declamatory florish, or a superficial "address to the church;" much less upon a pompous peremptory title, fuch as ushered into the field of controversy, an inconclusive performance of Dr. Gill's, intitled, "Infant-baptism the main pillar of Popery." I am certain the Doctor, with all his rabbinical learning, never proved that point; and I defy any fuccessor of his to prove it now. And I think I might with more propriety style Anabaptism the main pillar of Bigotry, than the excellent (tho' in this respect mistaken) Doctor cou'd affix a Popish stigma, to what can be proved to be of primitive, fcriptural, and protestant authenticity. If then any of the " able advocates" will give us folid argument, instead instead of positive affirmations, I shall read them with pleasure, and (perhaps) answer them at my leisure. In the mean time, I wish P. and all his brethren, the one Baptism.

PRINCIPALLY CONTAINING

- I. Some defensive pleas for the Institutions and Ministers of the Church of England, illiberally aspersed in two pamphlets lately published by Mr. Samuel Medley, of Liverpool, and Mr. James Turner, of Birmingham.
- II. A more particular refutation of Mr. MEDLEY's false doctrine of the ESSENTIALITY of dipping.
- III. The fcriptural MODE of administering Baptism, by POURING OF SPRINKLING of water, farther vindicated, from the most capital objections of Dr. Stennett, and the other two Anabaptists aforesaid.

By the Rev. RICHARD De COURCY;

"RES IPSA baptismi est ASPERSIO sanguinis Jesu Christi in remissionem peccatorum; que velut oculis nostris subjicitur externæ ASPERSIONIS signo."

"I readily allow that the word (baptize) does not necessarily imply a total immersion. Let the word relate to a part of the body, I to Ask no more."

PART I.

SHREWSBURY: Printed and fold by T. Wood; fold also by G. Robinson, Paternoster-Row; J. Matthews, Strand; E. and C. Dilly, in the Poultry, London; J. Gore, Liverpool; M. Swinney, Birmingham; S. Hazard, Bath; T. Mills, Bristol; and all other Booksellers in Town and Country.

N. B. My answer to Mr. Turner, begins at Chap. viii. If the candid reader will take the trouble to look over P. 316—322, he may, for once, have a fair opportunity, from some extracts collected, there, out of Mr. T.'s pamphlet, to see the genuine features of a certain warm phænomenon, which, I think, John Bunyan distinguishes by the name of "the red-hot Anabaptist." The extracts are really curious, and worthy a perusal.

PREFACE.

HERE are three things, for which I request the indulgence of the candid reader. I I hope he will pardon me, for answering Mess. Sandys and Parmenas only in a curfory manner. Thefe two writers (writers! did I call them?) have fuch a cast peculiar to themselves, and are so distinguishable by the groveling meannels of their ideas, as well as their happy talent at personal invective, that, to answer them fully, in their own style, would be to recriminate by scolding. Omitting, therefore, a huge quantity of Mr. S.'s pedantic scraps of Latin and Greek, and of his and P.'s abusive squibs. I have considered the most material parts in both their performances, as they were suggested by the thread of my introduction, and the references of my notes. I thought this would be a more eligible mode of linking together these twin-disputants, than to give them a serious or methodical reply.

2 As I found myself under a necessity of giving a little historic sketch of the origin and progress of the present controversy, I have also been obliged to recapitulate some particulars, which I had touched upon in my former tracts. I hope, however, the candid reader will pardon this unavoidable repetition, when he considers, (1) That it is occasioned through the very nature of the subject. For, when new facts start up, that have a reference to old ones, the former cannot be well related.

without an introduction of the latter; and an accurate narrative cannot be formed, without shewing the circumstansial connexion between both: (2) And that this little recapitulation is only taken up in the Introduction; where it does not interrupt, or clog, any part of the controversy itself; but rather prepares the reader for understanding some particulars, which relate to myself, and my brethren in controversy.

3 It requires some apology to my readers, that I have introduced the name of Dr. Stennett, in the course of my remarks. In taking that liberty, I mean not to infinuate, that there subsists the smallest resemblance between the spirit and style of this pious and polite writer, and those of my opponents. Their respective performances exhibit a striking contrast. But, as Mr. Medley is apparently a rambling and inconclusive reasoner, I have introduced Dr. S.'s more powerful arguments, as a supply for Mr. M's great desiciency.

INTRO-

INTRODUCTION.

IT is with the utmost reluctance, I again take up my pen, as a controvertist. Were I to indulge the natural inclination of my heart, I should totally abstract myself from every branch of polemic divinity; and, should chuse rather to glide silently along, in the placid stream of parochial obscurity, * than enter the troubled waters of controversial debate; where disputants, like ships in a storm, too violently dash one against another; while the precious cargo of truth is too often lost in the vehement scusse.

However, I believe that controverfy, when properly managed, has its use; and that the business of a controvertist and the spirit of a true christian are by no means incompatible. One of the most eminent christians, and greatest apostles, that ever lived, was also one of the wisest and most earnest disputants. Who ever brandished the controversial sword in the cause of truth, with greater firmness or success, than the great apostle of the Gentiles? yet, who ever shone a more illustrious ornament to christianity? But what need I adduce the example of Paul of Tarsus, when the great Apostle and Highpriest of our profession himself, condescended to grace the field of controversy with his presence?

Of what did our bleffed Lord's interviews, with the disputatious Scribes and Pharisees frequently confift, but of a controverfial chain of inimitable argumentation? With what wifdom did he answer their objections! What pains did he take to remove their prejudices! With what invincible firmnefs, plainnefs of speech, and cogency of reasoning, did he controvert their most favorite hypotheses! How effectually did he silence their cavils. and refute their specious fophistry! And, while this divine Philanthropist was influenced by the most ardent affection to the fouls of his opponents, yet with what feverity does he hew in pieces every Agag of error, with that two-edged fword that proceedeth out of his mouth! So that the very oil of intense love to truth and souls, which smoothed the edge of our LORD's controverfy with the caviling Tews, tended likewise to give it a proportionate keenness, penetration, and importance. As, therefore, we are indebted to controversy, as an eventual cause, for some of the most celebrated writings of that evangelic cafuist, St. Paul; fo, we must refer to the same source, some of the most glorious vindications of divine truth, that dropped from the mouth of him, who "fpake, as never man fpake."

Nor has controverfy been without its use in later ages. What important effects it produced in our land, to the detection of error, and dissemination of truth, let the writings of the illustrious Wickliff teflify; whose controverfial attack upon the popular errors of Rome, first rent the veil of darkness that that covered the established church here, and admitted that dawn of truth, which, by a gradual and dissuring illumination, spread far and wide throughout the continent, under the instrumentality of John Huss, Jerom of Prague. Luther, Calvin, &c. and at last arrived at a blessed meridian, during the propitious reigns of our English Josiah, King Edward VI. and our British Deborah, Queen Elizabeth; through the united labors of our eminent Reformers, Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Hooper, &c.

The starting of error has always given room for the more vigorous display of truth: This has awakened controversy; and the reciprocal attacks of controvertists, like the collision of the steel and flint, have tended to extract the latent sparks of truth, and to display their lustre the more abundantly. And, although the sparks, which issue from controversial collisions, have sometimes, thro the improper heat of bigoted incendiaries, fet the church in a flame; yet, this is no more an argument against the proper use of controversy, than a madman's burning a house, is an argument against all use of fire.—Religious controversy is a guard of revelation; whose double office is, to act offenfively in the refistence of error, and defensively, in the vindication of truth. The weapons of her warfare are, scripture and reason; which constitute a fort of two-edged fword, that cuts in pieces every unscriptural and irrational hypothesis. But, when positive affertions or dogmatic injunctions are substituted in the room of right reason, and fome fome dif-jointed or mif-applied texts are made to usurp the place of the analogy of saith, and scriptural argumentation; it ceases to be a wonder, that such suppositious artillery, in the hands of ignorance and bigotry, should be attended with the most mischievous consequences to the church of Christ; that warm bigots should be induced to unchurch and even unchristian their differing brethren; and that a favorite ceremony should be dignified with a Thus saith the Lord, when its genuine sanction is nothing more than Thus saith BIGOTRY. But thus an old observation is verified, In nomine Domini incipit omne malum.

In the management of religious controverfy, there are a few confiderations, which feem to me of real importance. I The cause of God and the establishment of truth are so intimately allied, that, whatever injures the one, must necessarily affect the other; and every controvertist, who would wish to strengthen the combination of interests between both, ought to have a single eye to the glory of God, and a zealous concern for the honor of truth.

2 When controverfy has religion for its subject, and the vindication of truth for its object, it ought, consequently, to take the facred scriptures for its guide. These should be the divine arsenal, from whence it should borrow its principal artillery; these, the rich mines, where truth should be investigated, and from whence the precious jewel should be dug; and these, the infallible judges, that should end every controversial strife.

3 But,

3 But, as scripture is the best interpreter of scripture, we are no more to take it detached from itself, than to make it the lacquey of corrupt reason. Therefore, in proving any point from the word of God, where the subject is either obscurely, or not expressly revealed, our conclusions should be determined by the general tenor of scripture, or by the connexion of one truth with another.

4 In order to investigate truth aright, we should labor to shake off all those preposessions, which show from a party-spirit; to relinquish every prejudice, connected with a particular mode of education; and to be accessible to the light of truth, though it discover the weakness of even a favorite

5 In urging any truth, which, in its confequences, dependencies, or application, may bear hard upon an opponent, the utmost care should be taken to preserve a distinction between his person and his opinions; and, while we level all the severity of scriptural argument against the one, to retain every degree of christian charity and tender benevolence towards the other. This rational and scriptural distinction will save from timid submission on the one hand, and from uncharitable bigotry, on the other; and will make religious controversy, a happy blending of truth and love.

6 In the application of any particular truth, it should be argumentum ad hominem, no farther, than as it has a reference to the main question in debate. Without attending to this, controvertists sometimes load their productions with such imper-

tinent trifles, as merit no reply; and with fuch heterogeneous stuff, as no judicious reader will think worthy of a ferious perufal. †

7 Though fome truths are not of equal importance with others, they are not therefore to be accounted absolutely indifferent. Every portion of truth is precious or important, in proportion to its connexion with the grand fundamentals of christianity. And, though there are fome truths, which neither constitute, nor are immediately connected with the foundation of the gospel: yet, confidering them, as possessing a place in the word of God; as declarative, either expressly or implicitly, of the will of the great Legislator; as including in their application, certain benefits. privileges, and advantages, to the vifible church of Christ; as bearing some distantial, symbolical reference to the covenant of grace; as preferving a fignificant commemoration of the most important bleffings; and as fealing, to the people of God, by a facramentary ratification, the great redemption of the LORD JESUS CHRIST; -I fay, confidering certain inferior truths in these several points of view, as they fland even distantially related to other more important ones, they feem to drop their unimportance, and to demand our most ferious submission.

+ If the reader chuse to examine a whole cargo of such trisles, he may enjoy a plentiful rummaging in a splenetic performance, lately published at Shrew/bury. The author of this anabaptistic farrago, is one Mr. Sandys; who, though but a Probationer for the Ministry, yet writes in a style as pompous as that of an Archbishop. This gentleman has thought proper to style his pamphlet "More Work for the Vicar of St. Alkmond's." Confidering the pompofity of the title, and the space of time the author exhausted in fabricating his performance, as well as the long previous notice Parmenas gave us of its future publication, I really thought we should have something great. Recollecting, that one of Mr. Toplady's controverfial tractates, was intitled "More Work, &c." my expectations were prodigiously raised by this similarity of titles. But, ex pede Herculem. I could discover the footsteps of the eminent Vicar of Eroad Hembury, no farther, than in the title-page of his poor imitator. All beside, was vox & praterea nibil. When Mr. S. is pleased to style his pamphlet "More Work;" I acknowledge the propriety of his title. It is more poor work indeed! fuch as has hitherto been the offspring of his brother in learning and politeness, good Mr. Parmenas the Deacon. It is WORK! Opus, PURRILIBUS bumeris formidandam! The prodigious multitude of Latin and Greek excerpta, with which this bit of genuine pedantry is overstocked, would afford tremendous work indeed, to a fchool-boy; while an intimation of the delicate phraseology, might even shock the abilities of those who live within the purlieus of Billing sgate. And if Mr. S. will only ranfack all the Spectators, Tatlers, Guardians, &c. and collect together another good large budget of mottos; and if, as heretefore, he will superadd to this incoherent mass, a little more perfonal invective, he may then publish again, and very properly intitle his learned publication, "More abusive Work for the Vicar of St. Alkmond's!"

In this light I look upon the facraments in general, and infant-baptism in particular. Far be it from me to suppose, however, that the admission of this ordinance, is a fundamental truth, or the rejection of it, a fundamental error. Though I possess a firm persuasion in my own mind, that the church-membership of infants, and their confequent right of introduction into the visible church by the initiatory facrament of baptism, are founded upon the unanimous evidence of scripture, reason, and antiquity; yet I dare not infinuate, without a gross violation of the laws of truth and christian charity; that our Anabaptist brethren, who diffent from us on this subject, are guilty of a fundamental mistake, & no more than we would B 2 confign

confign to perdition, the whole body of the people, called Quakers, because they discountenance both the facraments. Yet, in opposition to the one, as total rejectors, and to the others, as glaring mutilators of the institutions of Christ, we deem it a matter of indispensable obligation to defend the whole truth, on this subject, against each mode of innovation.

And we have an additional reason for maintaining a steady opposition to the advocates for Anabaptism, because bigotry is interwoven with their very sentiments. If Anabaptists were content with candidly adhering to their peculiarities, without animadverting severely on their differing brethren; I am certain that no Pædobaptist would ever take up his pen against them. But, when we hear one among them, bringing the charge of blindness against some of the brightest stars of the church; and, when the same person aggrandizes make them drop sentiments, grossly deviating from the laws of christian charity; and which, in their cooler moments, they would probably reject with horror. This has been the case with some warm Anabaptists. Impelled by the force of bigotry, and actuated by a defire of establishing a party, they have labored so to enhance the importance of their distinguishing rite, as to make submission to it a fundamental duty, and to affix implicit damnation to its rejectors. Of this Mr. Tombes was notoriously guilty, in an unguarded Address to the inhabitants of Bewdley; wherein, befides afferting, that " it was hypocrify that hindered them " from receiving the truth, he went still farther, and CHARGED THEIR " BLOOD ON THEIR OWN HEADS; as if (as Mr. Baxter fays) their damna-" tion were like to follow, if they were not re-baptized. He told them " also that Infant-Baptism pleaded from circumcisson, is a heresy." Thus, according to Mr. Tombes, the pious members of Mr. Baxter's church were bypocrites, heretics, and in danger of damnation, only because they would not bow down to the great Diana of Anabaptism, --- See this uncharitable bigotry, together with all the other concomitant errors of Anabaptists, exposed in Mr. Baxter's Plain Scripture-proof of Infants' Church-Membership and Baptism. dipping.

not fubservient to the communion of saints, in the order of the gospel," (by which, I suppose, is meant the gospel-order of Anabaptists,) "tends to the fubversion of the Redeemer's kingdom;" — when a seventh roundly affirms, "We result to communicate with the Church of England, for the same reason that she resules to communicate with per-

† If the reader chuse to see a specimen of genuine church-bigotry, I would have him by all means look into a little tract, from which I have taken the above quotations; intitled, A Humble Address to the Churches of Christ, &c, The author, Mr. Benjamin Wallin, is a pious minister among the Anabaptists; and I bear him record, that he has a prodigious zeal for the peculiar interests of the people with whom he is connected: but whether his zeal be according to knowledge, charity, truth, or candor, I fancy a few excerpta will easily determine. - Our zealous Author introduces his Address, with a lamentation that "godliness, and consequently the glory of the churches is daily decaying." If by the "decay of godliness" Mr. W. means, a declenfion from the principles and practice of the truth which is after godlinefs, I must take the liberty to charge his obfervation with a manifest mistake. For at the time the second edition of his Address was published, (A. D. 1761), true godliness was exceedingly upon the increase, and, blessed be God! still is; if the multiplication of gospel ministers and gospel professors be any proof. How . therefore, a rapid increase of true godliness should occasion, what Mr. W. calls a "decay of the glory of the churches," fo as (Pref. p. 6) "to reduce the visible interest of Icsus very low," I confess I am at a loss to find out; unless by the "glory of the churches" be intended, the glory of Anabaptism, and by a "reducing of the visible interest of Jesus," he, mean, the non-attendance of Anabaptists on their respective Ministers. And indeed, I shrewdly conjecture this to be Mr. W's meaning. For, although (in p. 19,) he introduces a person, as urging a plea for occafional absence from his stated minister, founded on the possibility of " fitting down with (other) children of God under a found gospelministry;" yet this reasonable, this catholic, this pious plea he rejects, by wildly supposing it to be suggested by the devil himself, and by asking him, (p. 20,) the following question: "Why do these persons, by a folemn act of union and fellowship with it, support and countenance, in the church of God, a form of human invention?" Here the fecret is all out; and the real English of Mr. IV.'s whole Address is, "Hear none, but us. Communicate with none but us; for the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are we!" O bigotry! hadft thou ever more trufty friends, or more zealous dovotees, than the Anabaptists in general, and Mr. Benjamin Wallin in particular?

fons, the cannot esteem baptized." * - When another Anabaptift gives the finishing stroke to the whole. by "charging their blood upon the heads" of those. who could not fee with his eyes, and who difregarded the thunder of his uncharitable anathema &: -I fay, when men thus glaringly violate the laws of charity, transgress the rules of christian moderation, burst the sacred bonds of catholic communion, and make a fort of monopoly of the church; is it to be wondered that the advocates for truth thould rife up against fuch men, and oppose their spirit and principles?

For my own part, I look upon an opposition to the spirit of ancient and modern Anabaptism, as a very important and necessary part of ministerial duty. When Anabaptifts enclose themselves within the strong-holds of bigotry; look down from their lofty ramparts, with fovereign contempt upon their differing brethren; and shoot their arrows of uncharitableness, against the children of God; what can we do, but object to their bigoted peculiarities the feven-fold shield of scripture, reason, antiquity, moderation, candor, charity and truth?

^{*} So Dr. Gale fays, in p. 28, of his--Reflexions! on Dr. Wall's Hiftery of Infant-Baptism. In answer to which, the Podobaptist Doctor smartly replies, in his excellent Defence of his own History, "This" (the above declaration) " is indeed fhort, full and open. But then it is a desperate uncharitable tenet; like to that of the Donatifts and Papifts: None faved, no Christians but themselves: None baptized for many hundred years, but a few of the Albigenses, at the year 1100, and a few straggling people in Holland and England fince 1522. Even those in Holland are most, or many of them cut off; for they do commonly use affusion." He (Dr. Gale) in this point, forfakes most of those of his own "communion." --- See Dr. Wall's Defence, p. 86.

xvi. INTRODUCTION.

As Anabaptists unchurch their brethren: must not the persons so unchurched, attempt a vindication of their common right to church-member-Thip? If we are looked upon as unbaptized; is it not our duty to remove the groundless infinuation? When bigotry vents its anathemas, and fchism multiplies divisions in the church; do not fcripture and reason suggest the necessity of expofing the cruel claims of the one, and of adminiftering a healing balm for the wounds occasioned by the other? Shall Anabaptism, rampant with party-zeal, obtrude its peculiarities upon the church of Christ, to the great disturbance of united congregations? and shall no scriptural expedient be adopted, in order to stop the progress of the schismatic intruder? Shall we tamely hear men, declaring from the prefs, as Mr. Wallin has done, that " uniting with other congregations is ' favoring the defign of disorderly men?" Shall bigotry thus usurp the place of christian charity? and shall not the hand of scripture argument push the monster from her usurped throne? Must this fame monster featter abroad the coals of discord? and shall we fit by as filent spectators, and attempt no extinction of the bickering fire, that has wafted, and still continues to waste, the vineyard of the LORD? Is it a matter of no importance, whether we are united in peace and truth; or whether we are perpetually to be diffurbed with the clamors of bigotry? Shall warm Anabaptists make dipping an effential badge of discipleship, and an essential ingredient in the obedience of faith? and shall we not remonstrate against such judaizing tenets? Shall we not plainly tell them that a particular quantity of cold water, no more constitutes the communion of faints, than meats and drinks do, the Kingdom of God? but that "we are all the children of God by faith in CHRIST JESUS?" that all the water in Fordan will not warm the heart, if faith and love be not refident there? that poor bigoted people may have prodigious faith in dipping, and yet none in CHRIST? and that foine Anabaptifts may fo effectually bury in their "watery grave" every fpark of good defire and brotherly love, as to commence frozen professors, fiery bigots, and uncharitable anathematizers? * - Shall we not tell them all this? Yes we will, even though, like Mr. Tombes, they shou'd "charge our blood upon our heads." For, "fay I these things as a man? or faith not the law the fame?"

It is an excellent observation, that error is easily discoverable, by the steam of bigotry, that proceeds from the monster's mouth. And when it pollutes the air of the church, with its infectious breath, is it not our duty, to level a serious blow at the hideous monster? and to point out its deformity, lest others suck in the soul taint, and become profelytes, not to truth, but to bigotry? I believe Anabaptism to be sounded in error; and in that kind of error, which is calculated to interrupt the harmony of the church of Christ: and that as once it was the parent of civil dissensions in Germany, it now, under an angelic form, is the nurse of continual religious animofities among the people of God. I am convinced therefore, that, with a view to the prosperity of Zion, the progress of the gospel, and the welfare of fouls, truth ought to buckle on her armor, and not be afraid to meet this huge Goliah, that defies and disturbs the armies of Israel. In doing this, a degree of plainness and fcriptural feverity will be unavoidable. I fay, scriptural feverity; by which I mean, fuch a feverity, as scripture warrants; which is, a firm opposition to error, founded on argument, strengthened by matter of fact, and tempered by brotherly love. I know, when error is hard pushed by forcible reasoning, and bigotry is hunted out of all its miferable fubterfuges, that their mistaken advocates are ready to publish a hue-and-cry against their opponents, by charging that upon their spirit, which is nothing more than the feverity of folid truth. Thus the blame cast upon the spirit, is often but an evalive apology for a defect of argument.

This kind of blame generally proceeds, like-wife from the very nature of error; which, like a difordered limb, cannot bear a fearching remedy. As the gentlest application of the surgeon's instrument to a fore place, will give pain; so the tenderest manner of treating error will be often censured as severe, when the fault is in the morbid part, and not in the hand, that searches it. And, if there should be an additional foreness through the latent gangrene of bigotry, the pain, and the clamor of severity, will increase, in proportion as the the penetrating probe attempts a radical cure. Hence good Mr. Baxter fays, in his admirable Vindication of Infants' Church-membership and Baptism, "I find it is the excoriation and exulceration of men's spirits, that usually causeth the smart, and maketh words (and arguments) to seem intolerable; which are either but a duty, or wholly blameless; or at least a sound mind would never have felt them."

However, throughout the course of my observations, I hope my heart will be influenced by that brotherly love, which is the genuine characteristic of a disciple of CHRIST, and which is ever ready to propose, and admit, terms of reconciliation between differing brethren; more especially, where the differences do not respect the fundamentals of christianity, While bigots dip their pen in the gall of bitter invective and party-rancor; may mine distil with the penetrating juice of solid truth, and the balfamic oil of christian affection! May the distillation of this double fluid, make my pen, the happy instrument, of carrying conviction to my opponent's mind, of detecting the monster bigotry, and of healing every wound that the controverfial fword may occasion! If one part of the mingled juice should at any time administer a fenfation of acrimony; may it be abundantly corrected through the foftening powers of the other! And may my pen, thus guided by truth, and love, fubserve the two-fold purpose, of being a corrosive to bigotry and error, and a promoter of brotherlykindness and charity! And, as long as my opponents ponents chuse to continue the debate, may our hearts be engaged in prayer to God! that no root of bitterness may spring up, to darken our views of truth, or interrupt the exercise of mutual affection!

Although the field of controversy, like the barren mountains of Gilboa, is too often destitute of the dew of real edification, or the rain of divine benediction; yet I believe, this arises, not so much from the thing itself, as, eventually, from the spirit of the disputants. Controversy is, or ought to be, one mode of investigating truth: and as no investigation can be so important, as that which has scriptural truth for its object; we have certainly reason to expect the blessing of God, in our pious refearches, provided they are guided by his word, influenced by his Spirit, restrained by his law, subordinate to his will, and conducive to the good of his church.

Ever fince my mind has been roused from its native indolence, and awakened to a serious solicitude about things of infinite moment, I have had an insatiate thirst after truth; which has been heightened, in proportion to the real importance of any particular truth, and the earnestness, with which it has been controverted. As a minister of the gospel, and a member of the church of England, I have been led to examine the peculiar sentiments of our church, respecting doctrines and discipline. As to the former, I can truly say, they appear to me, in their general import, perfectly to harmonize with that form of sound words, delivered by Christ and his apostles; and as to the latter, although candor obliges me to acknowledge, that some inferior parts of it may not be absolutely defensible, * and that the whole of it fuffers too great a degree of relaxation, in the prefent day of degeneracy; yet taking it altogether, in its general confishency with itself, I believe the difcipline, in conjunction with the excellent doctrinal fystem of our church, is calculated to preserve it from the inconveniences of confusion and disorder, as well as from the audacious affaults of herefy: and yet I am far from being offended with any christian friend, who is of a contrary opinion. As the practice of Infant-Baptisin is established in the church of England, and indeed, in every national reformed church throughout the world; and as this primitive institution has always been warmly

^{*} When I fay, fome inferior parts, I mean fuch as do not immediately affect the effence of our church-discipline. I most heartily approve of the formulary and offices of the Church of England, in general; and tho' there are some modes of expression, in some parts of them, which may not be strictly defensible; yet even these, when taken in connexion with the whole, and viewed through the medium of eander, feem to drop their exceptionable appearance. After this declaration, the reader will be furprized at Mr. Sandys's confident interrogatory, in p. 10, of his Letter to . "Will the V. deny, that there are a great many errors, retained in the formulary and offices of the Church of England? If he denies this, I beg leave to observe, he has greatly altered his opinion." -A " great many errors" in our formulary! And this " once my opinion!" In answer to the polite gentleman, who so humbly "begs leave" to make this "observation," I certify all whom it may concern, that I am here confronted with a false accusation; and that I never infinuated, afferted, or thought, that there was any thing in our formulary, that merited the ferious title of real errors; much less that they were either " great" or " many." On the contrary, I believe our excellent fervices abound with truths; and these too, many in number! and great in importance!

opposed by Anabaptists, from the mad reign of John of Leyden, down to the interregnum of Cromwell's usurpation, and from that halcyon Æra of Anabaptism to the present day; I have been naturally led to inquire into the ground of an opposition, which originated from German ranterism, and is still ventilated by some mistaken pious brethren in Great-Britain. The result of this inquiry has been, a sull conviction of the apostolic, primitive, scriptural, and rational validity of Insant-Baptism, and of the novelty and evil tendency of Anabaptism, whether German or British.

Since the commencement of the prefent controverfy, my mind has been necessarily turned towards the subject, so as to enter more deeply into it, than before: and, I declare, that, whatever doubts I may have formerly entertained, respecting some of the arguments of Pædodaptists, the more I deliberate upon these arguments, and upon those on the opposite side of the question, the more I am convinced of the strength of the one, and of the weakness and fallacy of the other. This conviction has greatly increased, fince I have had an opportunity of reviewing the publications of my opponents.—As for Mr. Sandys, and his brother, Mr. Parmenas the Deacon, I fancy every person of candor and taste will acknowledge, that a brace of disputants, were never better paired, than in the happy coalition of this duumvirate; and that for learning and politeness, they are such exact twins, one would be apt to imagine, like the fam'd Custor and Pollux, ex ovo procedere eodem: and, if malapertness and spleen are convertible terms for argument

argument and brotherly love, England cannot produce a like couple of controvertifts.—As for poor Mr. Turner, of Birmingham, he has written in fo much hafte, as to observe neither method, nor argument: and, like a person that has outrun his firength, before he has advanced half way in the race, Mr. T. pants for breath, where he should be cool to examine his fubject.—High as our expectations were raifed, by the advertised frontispiece of Mr. Medley's publication, I cannot help faving. that the title-page is an absolute burlesque upon the contents; and that one might almost look upon the title, "Christian Baptism defended," as an ironical fubstitute for Anabaptism deserted and Infant-Baptism defended. For, abstracted from a few sallies of vulgar witticism; an uncouth arrangement of some trite observations; not a little personal abuse; fome borrowed notes; and a prodigious stock of wordy tautology; -I fay, abstracted from these, Mr. M's pamphlet contains nothing truly formidable. And, howfoever this performance may be aggrandized in the imagination of his admiring friends, fo, as like fome huge figure to fetch a haughty firide over my puny letter; yet I think a few stones of argument levelled from the fling of God's word, will eafily shock this great Colossus; and bring it, together with all its brazen pomp, to the ground. And methinks, if ever the tantus hiatus was literally illustrated, it was, when Mr. M.'s production came forth, after a long previous pompous advertifement. +

[†] To the best of my recollection, the advertisement, declaring that Mr. Medley's pamphlet wou'd be shortly published, was inserted in the Shrewsburg xxiv. INTRODUCTION.

When I mention, above, fome doubts, respecting the arguments of Pædobaptists, none, I hope, will be so destitute of candor, as to infer, I ever doubted of the validity of the ordinance itself. And, yet if I had entertained such a doubt, the circumstance would not have been singular: for the great Zuinglius himself, and good Mr. Baxter, labored under such an embarrassiment; insomuch that the former at one time denied Insant-Baptism altogether, and the latter desered his entering upon a full ministerial charge, because of his latent scruples respecting the validity of the ordinance. And, it is exceedingly remarkable, that these two doubters, were afterwards, two of the most zealous and able desenders of the controverted rite. **

As

Shrewsbury Paper, Saturday, May 25th; and yet the advertisement in the same Paper announcing its actual publication, did not appear till July 20th. So that here was an interval of very near two months between the sirst and second notice; and this is called shortly. Our Anabaptist friends are in such a prodigious hurry to let the world know what is coming, that they advertise the suture birth, probably, before a great part of the expected prodigy is conceived. This looks like a specimen of Mr. Parmenas's precipitancy.

* Take Mr. Baxter's own words, in p. 3, of his Apology, prefixed to his Plain Scripture Proof of Infants' Church-Membership, &c .-- "These difcoveries did quickly stay me. And the feparating, dividing, scandalous courses of all the Anabaptists that I was acquainted with, with their ignorance and proud felf-esteem, and despising the preciousest ministers of Christ, deter me from affociating with them. Yet did I remain doubtful some time after. I resolved therefore, silently to forbear the practice, while I further studied the point. And I admired to find, that learned holy Reformer, Zuinglius, (afterwards the maul of the Anabaptifts) to deliver his experience in the very like kind, and that his case and mine were so near the same, that by arguments giving too much to" (that is, laying too great a stress on the outward and visible sign of) " baptism, he was driven quite to deny Infant-Baptism (there he went beyond me;) but then, fo he did also afterward in his powerful opposition to that error) as you may fee in Tom. 2, p. 63. And why should not I as freely confess my infirmities.

As the matter in debate, betwixt us and the Anabaptists, is not of a fundamental nature, and those things, wherein we agree, are much more important, than those, wherein we differ; I desire, throughout this controverfy, to keep in mind the necessary distinctions of the following celebrated maxim; In necessariis unitas; in non necessariis LIBERTAS; in omnibus CHARITAS. † That the reader may fee, how far myfelf and my opponents have adhered to, or fwerved from, this three-fold distinction, I will lay before him a little historic sketch of the present disputation, from its first rise to the prefent moment. And I shall the rather do this, because it will enable me to make some cursory. remarks on the respective productions of the twindisputants, Messrs. Parmenas and Sandys; and to remove fome of the dirt of falthood and mifreprefentation, wherewith, the pamphlets of these redoubtable Gemelli are overstocked. I fay, some; because, to remove all, would be an Herculean labor; like cleanfing the accumulated filth, from the polluted stables of Auguas.

Sometime, Ithink, in December 1775, Mr. Medley, an Anabaptist Minister, resident in Liverpool, made a visit to Shrewsbury. The principal intent of this visit, was, to administer immersion to certain members among the Anabaptists, who were deemed qualified for that ceremony. Lest the reader should suppose, that Mr. M.'s journey was occa-mities, as he? who yet afterwards spoke more sharply against their doctrines, practices, &c. as also did Luther, Calvin, Bullinger, Rhegius, Wigandus, with the rest of those holy, learned Resormers."

xxvi. INTRODUCTION.

fioned, through the absence, indisposition, or absolute want of a Baptist Minister in Shrewsbury, I think it necessary to inform him, that there is one in town, equally qualified with Mr. M. for difpenfing baptism; who, at the time the candidates required immersion, was neither absent, nor indifposed. But an unhappy division, subsisting between this minister and one part of the people here, (in which division, it seems, Parmenas, whose real name is Phillips, took a very active part; and the immersion taking place on Parmenas's side of the question,) a commission extraordinary was fent to Mr. M. appointing him administrator, in preference to his brother in difgrace. Thus Parmenas in fending, and Mr. M. in coming, united in a virtual fomentation of the present division. $\pm$

As I was not unacquainted with the defign of Mr. M.'s vifit, fo neither was I ignorant, that it was usual for Anabaptist-Ministers to expatiate on their favorite ceremony; and in all their baptizations, to produce whatever pittance of argument they are stocked with, in recommendation of their distinguishing mode. Taking this for granted, and feeling not the fmallest discomposure on the occasion (though I must own, I was a little furprised, that one who affects to lay so little stress on water-baptism, should dip his candidates in a cold bath in the depth of winter.) * I entertained Mr. M. at my house; and gave him that friendly reception, which I would, to any man of any denomination, where our differences in judgment did not respect essentials: And, in the course of conversation, I even assured Mr. M. that "if it were not for those partition-walls, which differences in exterior matters had unavoidably reared between particular churches, I should have been :glad to introduce him into my pulpit; because we were agreed in matters of greater importance." †

‡ Let none suppose I triumph in this division. Indeed I do not. On the contrary, that persons in the same town, of the same denomination, and of the same opinion too in the grand essentials of the gospel, should not unite in one and the same church-communion, is a circumstance, that gives me real concern. And, if Parmenas, otherwise Mr. Phillips, otherwise the "Deacon of the Eaptist-Church meeting, in High-street, Shrewsbury," will but muster up humility enough, to make a proper submission to the minister, in whose expulsion he had such an active hand; and if, in confequence of such humble submission, a re-union should take place between the present disagreeing parties; I most seriously declare, that such an event would afford me real pleasure; not only as it would restore peace to a divided class of pious Anabaptists, but, as it would likewise indicate, that poor, precipitate, insammable Parmenas, was at last converted into the humble and pacific Mr. Phillips.

* If it be asked, "But what must be done? Since Mr. S. is not qualified for dipping; and the Minister, whom P. and his party expelled from among them, is not tolerated to perform the ceremony; how shall the candidates be immersed?" I answer; if they will not accept of immersion from the Minister they still hold in disgrace, let them apply any where but to Liverpool. Mr. M. is by no means a proper person to be appointed administrator. His constitution is too instammable, ever to be trusted with an occasion of expatiating on cold water. And, if I may judge from the pomposity and vaunting nature of his late harangues, as well as from the uncommon bigotry of his spirit, I never knew an Anabaptist, less qualified to be a healer of church-breaches, or a promoter of peace. My vote then is;—any man for the dipper, but Mr. M. unless he should make a more humble, candid, and modest appearance, than he has done in his late visit to Shrewssury.

† This friendly declaration, Mr. Parmenas has mentioned in his third production, intitled, "Ecclefiafical Zeal," (or more properly Diaconal Fary,) but with what intent, I am at a loss to find out; unless it be, to infinuate a contrast between this declaration and my subsequent Letter to Mr. M. But the force of this infinuation is repelled, by confidering, that when it was made, I was totally ignorant of Mr. M.'s false doctrine of the effentiality of dipping. "Till he recants that, I revoke my declaration.

D 2 . And

xxviii. I N T R O D U C T I O N.

And the evening after this vifit, I went to hear Mr. M preach.

All this time I heard none of the exceptionable passages in Mr. M.'s exhortations on the necessity of dipping. But, after his departure, hearing from one and another, that his animadversions were full of ridicule, and feverity; and, that, befides maintaining his favorite point with much dogmatic pofitiveness, he made submission to believers' dipping " ESSENTIAL to the obedience of faith;" perceiving, that fuch doctrine, favored strongly of the Galatian leaven; tended to corrupt the gospel of CHRIST; and was calculated to embarrafs the minds of the fimple; I thought, a few falutary hints on the fubject, would not be altogether useless or unseasonable. Accordingly, as the best mode of calling this positive gentleman to an account, and of refcuing the minds of some of my hearers from any degree of embarraffment, I transmitted my thoughts to the prefs.

As I wished to proceed with a degree of caution, I wrote to Mr. Phillips, acquainting him frankly with my design, and requesting his information with respect to Mr. M.'s doctrine of baptismal essentiality. Poor P. was immediately thrown into such a pannic and agitation of mind, that he sets about an Address to the Baptist-Church meeting, in Highstreet, Shrewsbury; which was both finished, published, and read by his reverend auxiliary in the meeting, before my pamphlet saw the light. As this little scrap of splenetic divinity, contained the most glaring misrepresentations of the state, spirit, and conduct of Pædobaptists, I thought a Word to Parmenas might repress the impertinencies of his pen; check the bigotry of his spirit; and serve as a little rereward to my Letter to a Baptist-Minister. I hoped also, that a hint to Parmenas, respecting his difqualification, as an author, might fave the public from the lumber of his future productions: But I was mistaken. The same Parmenas writes again. His fecond performance is worse than the first; for this fails in every respect. Having discovered a piece of shameful disingenuity, patronized by Mr. Sandys under the rose, I gave a Reply to my wordy antagonist, in which I detected and exposed the ignorance and flyness of his reverend aid-de-camp; and held forth both to public view, as pretenders to divinity and learning.

I really thought, after the first admonition, Parmenas would take the friendly hint; but more especially after I had made him sick of his efforts in criticism, logic, and translation. But I was too sanguine in my expectations; and a judicious note of the respectable London Reviewers, proves what a very incompetent judge I am of the spirit and genius of bad writers. * However, could I suppose it possible, after wresting out of Parmenas's hand every weapon of low chicanery, paralogism, and salse criticism, with which he vapored, that he would take up the gauntlet the third time? Could ^{* &}quot;Had Mr. R. D. half the experience of us, Reviewers, he would know, that there is not an animal on the earth, so indocile, untrastable, and felf-sufficient, as a bad writer.——He might, just as soon make a silken purse of a sow's ear, as make a bad writer lay down his pen, on a sull conviction he is not a good one." Excellent observation! I earnestly recommend it to Parmenas, and the other learned Duamvir.

the world believe it, that a poor illiterate man, would thrice defert his proper business, and thew his face in the field of controverfy? Strange and unaccountable as it may feem, it is strictly true. But mark the cunning of our Salopian Deacon: Having made him ashamed of his pompous fignature, Parmenas, he intirely drops it, and fends forth his third publication, without a name; probably, that as an anonymous feribbler, he might give full fcope to the overflowings of his abufive pen, which might be otherwise restrained under the use of a venerable fcripture name; and that people might not fuppose that Mr. Anonymous was Mr. Parmenas; though but a peep into the Dialogue might foon convince one of the smallest discernment, that as face answereth to face in a glass, so do the features of the Dialogist to those of the wordy Addresser.

Whoever reads Parmenas's late Dialogue, will naturally suppose, that he has now "brought forth" all his "little" flock "of knowledge;" and that, having got to the very zenith of passion, he has at last arrived at his ne-plus-ultra of abuse. And yet, fuch is the fertility of the ingenious Parmenas's imagination, and fo strongly does he feem affected with a certain diforder, peculiar to bad writers, called cacoëthes scribendi the itch of scribbling; that I should not be at all furprised, if, after having exhibited himself, as an addresser, a critic, a logician, a translator, a dialogue-writer, a deacon, he should make one grand effort more; strain all the nerves of his foaring genius; and, to the aftonishment of the whole world of pamphleteers, produce a fourth tract.

tract, that might merit a place in the records of the famed Martinus Scriblerus. I really think he will be dabbling at the press again: and, my prognostications are strengthened, not only by the obfervation of the Reviewers, but likewise by the following opinion of the Poet;

- " Who shames a scribbler? Break one cobweb thro"
- "He spins the slight, self-pleasing thread a-new:
- " Destroy his fib or fophistry; in vain;
- "The creature's at his dirty work again;
- "Thron'd on the centre of his thin defigns,
- " Proud of his poor extent of flimzy lines."

If Parmenas, and his reverend coadjutor Mr. Sandys, have not intirely exhausted their quiver of malevolence; and if there be ever a remaining arrow of invective which they have not as yet shot; I give them this public notice, that the field is open for them; that they may enter as soon as they please; that they may vapor away, by the hour, undisturbed, for me; that I shall never once more interrupt them, in their translation of mottos, their formation of syllogisms, or even in the important work of their efforts in syllabic criticism; † and that,

[†] Alluding to the difingenuous conduct of these two crities, in a case mentioned in my Reply to Parmenas, p. 26. Although I have there, with a little mild irony, exposed the fact, yet Mr. S. in his late performance, attempts to vindicate himself. But his vindication only proves, that impertinence, when detected, will sly to the pitiful subtersuges of eva-son and chicanery, rather than to the light of open confession. The fact is simply this.—When P. and S. animadverted on the omission of a syllable in imitatores, the Printer took my manuscript, without my knowledge, to prove the error to be really not mine, but that of the press. They nevertheless suffered the paultry animadversion to stand. And now that I have exposed them for it, our syllabic critic slies off, and shuffles, like a right pedant, by saying "I sent back my proof-sheet, uncorrected."

that, if they should fally forth into the field of controversy again, in order to make a redoubled attack on the "battery of the learned Vicar," I shall not take a fingle step out of my parochial retirement, so much as to see what they are about, for the reason suggested in the following lines;

- " Pains, reading, study, are their just pretence,
- .. And all they want is, truth, good manners, sense:
- " Commas and points they fet exactly right,
- "And 'twere a fin to rob them of their mite!" *Here

What then? Does that prove I wrote false Latin? Besides, if publications are to be canvafied by fuch impertinent criticisms, where is the author that will stand exempt from the imputation of writing, not only bad Latin, but bad English too? Yea, what will become of the critical word-catcher himself? For, if I were to imitate his impertinence, I could point out two blunders in p. 16, 17, of his pamphlet; and blunders, not mentioned in his lift of errata too; one of which turns an epic patch of this gentleman's into down-right nonfense, and the other destroys the fense, prosody and grammar of a Latin line. But shall I say to this gentleman, "Sir, you should have taken better care of your Latin and Greek fentences." Or shall I shuffle with the blunderer himself, and fay, "I believe none will hefitate to fay" these two errors "were ultimately the quoter's?" No. I leave fuch criticisms to the couple of " word-catchers that live on syllables." -- O but I " criticized on P.'s inaccuracies." So I did. But the case is not parallel. He wrote his nonsense: he published and republished his nonsense: and, what is worse, his fyllabic auxiliary once abetted and now defends his nonfense .- O but I mis-translated "Dixit adhuc aliquid -- nil fane." I did not. The accurate word-catchers left out the note of interrogation, and I construed their Latin accordingly. So that, if they write nonfense, am I to be blamed for confirming their nonfense. The truth is, I thought they purposely omitted the interrogation, in order to qualify their calling my Vindication a mere nothing. q.d. "He has faid fomething --- but upon the whole, this fomething is, in reality, nothing." This was a just translation, exhibited sense, and contained a more modest reflexion on my pamphlet, than when decorated with an infolent note of Interrogation; which infinuates, that I have absolutely faid nothing. So that, our fabricators of nonsense have here, only the moderate triumph of a nonfentical criticism. But, whoever remembers how they blundered in the translation of my motto, will think that their triumph, in quality of translators is for ever fullied, by that never-to-be-forgotten faux pas.

* So far am I from being disposed to rob the worthy twin-disputants of their pretensions to a literary mite, that, on the centrary, I wish to be inflammental.

Here I should drop Messirs. P. and S. and salute these syllabic-learned adelphi with a longum vale, were it not that dire necessity obliges me to defer my long farewell, 'till I have exposed the falthood of their representations, and the futility of some of their arguments. And before I do this, I must beg leave to premise, that of the two. I look upon Mr. S. as the less formidable in point of close arguing; but in point of illiberal abuse, Parmenas himself is but a dwarf to his reverend auxiliary. Though P. is really a better English writer † and a better reasoner (tho' bad is the best) than S. yet instrumental in adding to the stock, by affording them a fresh opportunity of displaying their genius, and exhibiting their (what Mr. S. calls) "immense stores of classical treasure." As this pamphlet is likely to be pretty large, it will give them lows ad agendum amplissimus. And, if they think proper to review all the little errata, in commas, syllables, punctuation, letters, &c. they shall be dubbed emendators laureat, correspondent of the press; and shall have my sull consent, for receiving an annual tributary panegyric, from those renowned Literati, the worthy Society

+ In order, once for all, to shame P.'s auxiliary, out of his pedantry and impertinence, I need only remark, that when a correct English fentence is laid before him, he cannot discover its correctness; and by attempting to find fault, he gives an additional manifestation of his ignorance. In my Reply to Parmenas, I drop the following concession, "- Upon the walls of this battery (of scripture and reason) I should never have prefumed to appear, when I confidered 'that it' (battery, the immediate antecedent) " furnishes many more able and experienced foldiers than myfelf." Is it any deviation from grammar, to make it refer to battery? Or from fenfe, to fay, a "bettery" of scripture and reafon "furnishes," or exhibits, foldiers? Our pedantic word-catcher dogmatizes in an inftant, and, without informing us why, pronounces the fentence " neither fense nor grammar." But, in so doing, he reminds me of the fable of the viper and file. Offendit folido. The fentence is too hard for our criticifing viper's teeth .- But "it contains a sollcism!" As I never met with fuch a word in the English language, I turned back to our critic's table of errata; and, though he has marked feveral words there, xxxiv. INTRODUCTION.

he labors under the disadvantage, of not being able to fcold fo profusely in Latin and Greek. P. abuses in plain English; but S. in "immense stores of classical treasure." The one talks big, but ftill retains his Liliputian gait. Whereas the other takes gigantic firides in invective; and firuts tanto molimine, that you would imagine it was Fack the Giant-killer himself; shakes his polemic ægis, and informs his opponent that "he lets him go this time with a gentle chastifement;" confronts you with the high founding names of Agamemnon, Peleides, with whom I conjecture (by the bye) he has a very superficial acquaintance; and vapors away upon the shoulders of Homer, Horace, &c. as a Tig mayac. * But there, that are defective only in a letter, I perceive he has taken no notice of this. Upon turning back to p. 37, I find, at the bottom of the page, the same word a fecond time, written "filicism." Now, this is to certify our blundering word-catcher, that, if he intended to give us a specimen of his critical knowledge of English, or of the derivation of English words, he should have written folecism, or more properly folecism a solouxizest folecisme; a word derived from Soloe a city of Cilicia, the inchabitants of which were remarkable for their barbarisms. Would not any person imagine our Salopian Solveist had once breathed the air of the Silician Soloe? I am so convinced that his whole genius is one grand compound of solveism, that, from this day forth,

^{*} It seems a very fortunate circumstance for Mr. S. that I happened, in my Reply to Parmenas, to give him a little check for his disingenuity in criticism, (from which he has not yet exculpated himself,) and for his ignorance of common Latin. This gentle touch of my controversial wand, which, I hoped, like the samed Caduceus, would have effectually lulled to profound rest this gentleman's "polemic acumen," had a contrary effect: it roused his sleeping genius; and, like the happy blow of Vulcan's hatchet, that extracted from Jove's pate the martial and sapient Goddess Minerva, it turned out of Mr. S.'s smitten pericranium, such "immense stores of classical treasure," as might otherwise have lain dormant within the teeming womb of his pregnant understanding. Happy there-

INTRODUCTION. XXXV

But to return to P.—Ever fince I have engaged in this controverfy, I have observed, that all my opponents (except Mr. Turner) have accosted me with personal abuse, in the very titles of their refpective publications; and none more fo, than the author of " Ecclefiafical Zeal," or Diaconal Rage. I had, in my "Reply to Parmenas," declared, that "I was forry to make any (controversial) attack "upon (the Anabaptifts, whom I esteemed as) " christian brethren; of whose piety I had a consi-" derable opinion, &c." This candid declaration, P. introduces in his title-page, and contrasts it with a text of fcripture, which, in the hand of poor enraged Parmenas, charges me with uttering an untruth. The judicious reader will eafily fee, that this is an indirect method of publicly calling a man a lyar; and, when he confiders, that this is done, through the shameful abuse of a friendly declaration, and through the perverted application of God's word; must not his pity be excited for a poor man, who thus advertises his prophane irreverence in handling scripture? overlooks the most fore for Mr. S.! happy for the public! and thrice happy for me! that I happened to give the fortunate blow! otherwise we might have lost "immense treasure" indeed! But if my pen, has hitherto turned out such a capital midwise to Mr. S.'s noddle; what may we not expect from this mere energetic blow, and the second production it is little to bring forth? Instead of a tyro, armed cap-a-pee, with all the martial implements of bigotry, and decorated with shining patches of heroic verse; may we not expect some demi-reverend pædagogue, accourted in old Scriblerus's coat-of-mail new-surbished? keeping the world in awe with his critical conundrums, brilliant mottos, theological scraps; and disfusing terror through the whole circle of the literati, with the thundering panoply of his

fanguine expressions of candor? and even assumes the divine prerogative of knowing what is in my heart? I declare, such advertised impiety shocks me. And I take this method of acquainting Mr. P. that if he makes no better improvement in genuine piety, while sitting at the seet of his Anabaptist Gamaliel; the Deacon will be no more a credit to the Pastor, than the Pastor has hitherto shewn himself to the Deacon.

I wish, when my expressions of candor were to be foifted into P's ridiculous title-page, he had not mangled them. I fay, in my Reply to Parmenas, "Of "whose piety I have, upon the whole, a considera-"ble opinion, &c. The words "upon the whole," P. leaves out; and, by fo doing, deftroys, not only the emphasis of my declaration, but also the restrictive clause, which determines my precise. meaning. For, when I declare "I have a confi-" derable opinion of the piety of Anabaptists, upon "the whole," my obvious meaning, is; that although, some Anabaptists have no piety at all, and the piety of others may be difgraced with exceptionable conduct; yet, that, taking them altogether as a professing community, they are "Chris-"tian brethren, people upon the whole, of confide-" rable piety, and conflitute a respectable body of " Protestant Dissenters." If P. does not as yet understand my meaning, I will exemplify it for him, in an observation ad hominem, viz. Though I esteem the Anabaptists to be persons of considerable piety, upon the whole; yet this implies an exception, as to fome individuals; fo, as that I can retain tain my candid opinion inviolate; even though I should esteem Parmenas, a man of no piety at all.

P. aided by the prodigious fertility of his imagination, and impelled through the violent paroxyfm of a malignant disorder, under which he labors, called the spleen, has thrown his last production into the form of a Dialogue; to which he has annexed a delicate little tail-piece, called an Address. Our curious Dialogist has taken care, that, of the parties. which compose his fcurrilous drama, there should be a majority for his fide of the question; and that the trialogue thould end in the praise and exaltation of Anabaptism. This unfair method of crowing over an opponent, reminds me of the manner, in which the Papists in Ireland frequently manage a private opposition to the principles of Protestantism. It is customary with these deluded people, to hold meetings, for the purpose of confidering the ground of the Protestant religion. Into these meetings a real Protestant can never procure admission, except he enter in disguise; and even in that case, he must lie incog. without prefuming to open his lips. The scene, upon those occasions, generally opens, with fome feeble anathemas against Protestantism, and fome high-flown praises in commendation of Popery. A controverfy then begins, in the form of a Dialogue, between two real Papists, one of whom is made to personate a Protestant; while the other, pleads the cause of his mother, the Church, in propriâ personâ. But, as it sometimes happens, that the personated Protestant starts something, which his adversary cannot cleverly refute; care is taken

in such a case, that a fort of corps-de-reserve, or Popish second should attend, somewhat like P.'s Tebaliah, who might strengthen the hands of his tottering brother. By this means, the argumentation is so conducted, that poor Protestantism is left destitute of a fingle prop for its support; its advocates are represented as " blind, not of the church, not steering clear of the general corruption;" while a fourth person sustains the office of a fort of Popish Moderator; and in his official capacity, refembles Parmenas, the Deacon, fumming up the evidence in favor of Anabaptism. Thus the arguments in favor of Popery preponderate; the poor Protestant is vanquished; the victorious Papist triumphs; his affifting Tebaliah, blusters, like Mr. Sandys, with his "immense stores of classical treasure;" while I can conceive the Popish Moderator, with dogmatic face, and triumphant eclat, giving his verdict in the following manner, viz. "There are no people right in all the world, but Roman-Catholics !"

Who fees not, from this method of conducting controversies, in the Dialogue form, that the dramatis persona in P.'s argumentative burlesque, exactly resemble the parties in a Roman-Catholic circle of disputants? And, who does not also see, that, under this arbitrary mode of writing, truth may be kept intirely out of view, and palpable bigotry lie artfully concealed?—As for P.'s elegant tailpiece, intitled, "A congratulatory Address, &c." it sparkles with so much wit; displays such an uncommon brilliancy of imagination; exhibits such a cluster a cluster of elegant ideas; and lays open fuch an immense stock of good manners and good fense; that, if the fabrication of this same Address does not immortalize the name of the illustrious "Deacon of the" (Ana) "baptist-Church, meeting in " High-fireet, Shrewsbury," I know not what will. A disciple of Pythagoras, who believed the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, would, without the fmallest hesitation, conclude, that the foul of fome necromantic hero, had, by a most fortunate metempsychosis, transmigrated into the body of Parmenas; and would, therefore, heartily felicitate the Anabaptists upon so important a transmigration. And, whereas fome perfons have hitherto. supposed, he was nothing more than an illiterate, rebus-writer, I beg fuch would read the fag-end of his dialogue, and then judge, whether they should not alter an opinion, which tends to the degradation of one, who pries fo deeply into the regions of the dead. By fummoning, into the field of controversy, the ghost of a departed heathen, to affift our Deacon's tottering cause, the reader will eafily observe, that P. very dexterously procedes according to the old infernal maxim:

And whereas he hath displayed his genius in forming addresses, in criticism, logic, translation, dialogue-writing, ghost-raising, &c. thould not his brethren in these several departments of science,

procede with all possible expedition, to a solemn enrolment of their learned brother among the literati? I know none so proper to preside at so important a ceremony, as his reverend auxiliary; because no person seems so exact a counter-part to him, in delicate invention. Witness this reverend gentleman's taking occasion to insult his opponent, by comparing his "looks, to those of "Pharaoh's lean kine." As I have no disposition to retaliate such polite assimilation, I leave it to the decision of any connoisseur in physiognomy, who understands the—tetrum ante omnia vultum; whether an appeal to people's "looks," comes with any tolerable grace from Mr. Sandys.

But, before P.'s enrolment, let me address him upon two particulars, which, I fear will do no credit to his Deaconship .- 1 P. fays, in p. 10, 11, of his Dialogue, "I have no doubt but the Vicar " had laid the platform; erected the out-works; " and planted the cannon, fometime before; " only catched at the late opportunity, to fire away " upon his opponents, for tis much if he ever " bore a real good will to that party." Alas! for poor precipitate Parmenas! If his confidence respecting his falvation, rested upon as slight a batis, as the above infinuations, I thould really tremble for him. For, I affure thee, gentle reader, they are founded upon two indirect falshoods, (1) When he fays, "It is much if I ever bore " a good will to his party," he falfly accuses me. For I always did, and, I trust, always shall bear a good-will, not only to Anabaptists, but to every other denomination of christians, upon the face of the earth. And though I disapprove of, and explicitly reprehend, the bigotry and positiveness of some Anabaptists; yet I think, good-will to their perfons is perfectly compatible with a disapprobation of their distinguishing principles; and in this point of view, my good-will extends even to Parmenas himself, though he is in many respects an object of my pity and contempt. (2) It is an equally false infinuation, that "I had laid the platform" of my late publication, " fometime before." S. far from it, that I never wrote a fingle line upon the. fubject, nor thought deeply upon it, antecedently to my late publication. I had intended, indeed, while I was Curate of Shawbury, to have republished Bostwick's Vindication, with a recommendatory Preface: but, as there was not a fingle Anabaptist within the limits of my Curacy, and I was unwilling to adopt even this indirect and gentle method of opposing a people, for several of whom I entertained, and do still entertain a fincere esteem; I therefore wholly defisted from my defign, and never wrote a line of my intended recommendation of Bostwick. And I should have still observed the same pacific silence, had not the Anabaptist Champion from Liverpool, disturbed our neighbourhood, with his ill-timed, ludicrous harangues, in favor of dipping; and virtually called us into the field of controversy, to check his bigotry, and positiveness.

2 But the finishing stroke of falshood, and invidious infinuation, which P. has given us in his

xlii. INTRODUCTION.

Dialogue, is in p. 8. "What reason have the Anabaptists to expect quarters, when, (if common report may be credited) the same learned combatant is preparing to attack one of his reverend brethren of the Church of England; whose associative, candor, and moderation towards Dissenters, has for a long time been as conspicuous, as the Vicar's intemperate zeal."

To this infinuation, I might give no other reply, than that it is as replete with falfhood, as it is big with calumny. However, for the fake of the public, to whom I owe an explanatory answer, I will take a little pains, to exculpate myself from the invidious accusation. (1) When P. contrasts the "affability, candor, and moderation" of some anonymous Churchman, to my "intemperate zeal" towards "Diffenters," mark, with what invidious cunning, he changes the fubject from a controversial debate with Anabaptists in particular, to a charge of "intemperate zeal" towards Dissenters in general. As to P.'s brethren, let it be remembered once for all that I attack them, not because they are Diffenters, but because they are Anabaptists or re-baptizers; and because, under this character, they dissent from all the other Dissenters and Church-men in the world. Therefore, whether my zeal be temperate or intemperate, it never meditated an attack upon Dissenters, as fuch. So far from it, that I wish to cultivate the utmost peace, friendship, and catholic familiarity, with that very numerous, and very respectable body, as long as I live. And I dare affirm, that the anonymous Cler-gyman, to whom P. refers, does not entertain fentiments of greater moderation towards Dissenters, than myfelf. But he has not attacked Anabaptism; and I have. Hinc illæ lachrymæ! However, if this same anonymous Clergyman, will but take up his pen, in defence of a divine institution, which Anabaptists reject; he will probably foon find, that his moderation, at prefent fo much applauded, will instantly be changed (as far as misrepresentation can change it) into zeal as intemperate, as my own; and that the applauding P. can currifavor and calumniate alternis vicibus, whoever be the opponent, when Anabaptism is the thing opposed. (2) That "I am preparing to attack one of my reverend brethren in the Church of England," is an abfolute mistake. I sometime ago, began a treatife, which I intend as A testimony to some important dostrines of the Reformation; in which the name of any particular Clergyman, will not be once introduced. For, although the pamphlet, when completed, will wear rather a controverfial form, yet the public will fee, that its object is not any individual in particular. but all, who, in my opinion, notoriously depart from the great doctrines, they have foleninly fubfcribed. That there are some such inconsistent characters in the Church of England, I am neither ashamed nor afraid to declare; and this, I would hope, even the currifavoring P. himself must ingenuously acknowledge. To oppose such, I deem an. indifpensable duty: and, while I think the truth of God and the Articles of our excellent Church, will bear me out in fuch an opposition, I am equally regardless regardless of the slandering innuendos of a pert Anabaptist, as of the favor of any Socinian or Arian Ecclesiastic in the world.—Now, can a pamphlet, which does not oppose any Clergyman in particular, and which will not once mention the name of the gentleman to whom P. refers, be called an "attack' upon him? May not a man explicitly publish his sentiments on the great doctrines of his own church, and as explicitly oppose the contrary opinions, without an imputation of "intemperate zeal?"

But I cannot difmifs this piece of fly calumny, without a few additional remarks. (1) The calumniator himself has been pleated, in concert with his reverend auxiliary, to strip me of all pretensions to the two-fold character of the Christian, and the Gentleman, because I prefumed, forsooth, to prefent Mr. Medley with a few strictures, founded on a report of the fevere and ludicrous things, he advanced in his public discourses. Yet the very person, who abuses me for this simple circumstance, is guilty of a more condemnable retaliation. For, he publishes a vague infinuation, which I never once dropped either from the pulpit, or the press, and which my pamphlet, if ever published, will fufficiently refute. I leave the public, therefore, to determine, what name will best fuit the author of fuch a groundless and malevolent report. (2) But, even suppose, that I had intended a controverfial attack upon any heterodox Clergyman, would fuch a circumstance redound to my difhonor? Must Anti-trinitarians assault the fundamenta!

mental doctrines of our Church, and publish their errors from the pulpit and from the press? And shall the friends of our excellent establishment. filently and tamely behold fuch daring conduct. and urge no remonstrance against the innovators? -And suppose, that I should humbly attempt to obviate the evil tendency of some popular errors, which are too rampant in the Kingdom in general, and are perhaps too prevalent in $S_{---}y$; will P_{-} loft to all respect for the glory of the gospel, improve fuch a circumstance against me? Does not the fimple declaration of truth itself, subject a man to a fufficiency of odium? But must P. make the world anticipate that odium, by publishing an invidious rumor, which would represent me, not as a friend to truth, but as a pragmatic zealot? And even, if I was actually preparing an attack against an heterodox Clergyman of the Church of England; will P. who pretends to reverence truth, virtually fide with the advocates for error, by publishing a disapprobation of my conduct? Will he thus cringe to heterodoxy, in direct violation of the dictates of his conscience? The injury he does to my character, is trifling, when compared with the more material affront he, hereby, virtually gives to truth itself. And what shall we think of a man, who can thus fneakingly currifavor? I believe, whenever poor P. takes up his pen, his conscience is forely agitated by his old diforder, the spleen: and I hope, when fuch malignant agitation fubfides, and a lucid interval takes place, that his conscience will be restored to its former state of tenderness.

When I reflect what prodigious attempts the renowned twin-disputants have made, in criticism. translation, &c. I am not furprited to find, that they equally fucceed in argumentation. Take one remarkable instance in p. 19 of Mr. Sandys's pamphlet. This Gentleman! after discharging a number of little classical pop-guns, which he has loaded with a parcel of Latin and Greek rags; * and after almost exhausting the plentiful stock of his pedantry and abuse together, at last draws breath, and condescends to promise his readers, "assertion with proof." After this ferious parade, we should naturally expect, that P.'s plenipotentiary would give us logical premiffes, and a logical conclusion. For, thus this invincible reasoner prefaces his demonstration. " Hold a little, and it shall be affertion proved." And then, in a little string of borrowed quatations, he tells us, what a few authors merely affert concerning the mode of baptizing by immer fion. But, do these authors prove any thing upon the subject? No! Not one single quotation, he has brought, has the least shadow of a proof. The whole string confists of nothing but naked affertions; fuch as "To be baptized, is to be dipped into the water.—Baptism, fignifies an immertion or washing of the whole body." These are this huge logician's proofs! Alas! master, for they are all BORROWED too! Perhaps Mr. S. mistook the quantity for the quality of his quotations. Supposing that ten affertions were adequate to so many proofs, he draws his conclusion accordingly. But he ought to know, that ten thousand naked affertions are not tantamount to one demonstration. What a pity, this mighty reasoner did not apply to Parmenas, for a little of his logical affiftance! I can assure him, (though perhaps the assurance may mortify his pedantic pride,) that P. could have helped him out upon this occasion. For, however Mr. S. might have affisted P. to construc a Latin sentence, I declare P. is capable of being his auxiliary in logic. However, that Mr. S. may henceforward be able to diffinguish between an affertion and a proof, I will favor him with argumentum ad hominem. Exempli gratia. Suppose I say that Mr. S. does not understand the very first principles of logical reasoning. Does my bare afferting this; prove that he is so consummately ignorant? No. certainly. But suppose I bring the opinions of ten friends, who affert the fame. Will not their ten affertions, superadded to mine, amount to a proof? No. For the fame reason that one bare affertion fails of a proof, ten thousand would. Then it remains to be proved; thus;

A man, who affirms that the bare affertions of others are so many proofs, cannot be acquainted with the very first principles of logical reasoning:

But Mr. Sandys has affirmed that the bare affertions of others are so many proofs:

Therefore Mr. S. cannot be acquainted with the very first principles of logical reasoning. Q. E. D.

xlviii. INTRODUCTION.

However our positive asserter fails in his mode of arguing in favor of immersion, his head is so full of the darling topic, that his very abufive fimilitudes are drawn from the idea of dipping. Hence in p. 18. "Give him a good found dipping, and try whether that will answer the end, &c." The dipper here proposes to some of his brethren, who chuse to undertake the scandalous office, that, like Mr. S. who has fet them the bright example, they would imitate his delicate phraseology. I must do this polithed Gentleman the justice to acknowledge, that. "in spite that can creep" he has not his fellow in the Kingdom; and that, if he is in future as fuccessful a practitioner in dipping, as he now proves himfelf an adept in vilifying, Anabaptifin could never boaft of fuch a dipper. But I hope there are few such Anabaptists. For, Mr. S. feems fo totally given up to all the blackness of malevolence, and darkness of bigotry, that, like another Peleides, one would imagine he had been dipped in the gloomy waters of Styx: only, with this difference, that, whereas the Gracian Hero, was not totally immerfed, and therefore not totally invulnerable, our Anabaptist Champion, feems to have been plunged in the Stygian wave, from the heel to the head; and this bitter baptism seems to have Ipread such an universal petrifaction throughout, that I know hardly a fingle part in him that is vulnerable. Could I but be fortunate enough, like the man who fo fuccessfully drew his bow at a venture, to point an arrow of keen argument, or mild irony, between the joints of the harness, in which our adamantine

Hero is encafed, I might then hope to do fome execution. But hic labor! hoc opus est! I am not a markf-man fufficiently skilful, to expect such a phænomenon. Who knows how far a re-baptization might contribute towards dissolving the petrifaction of bigotry, and effrontery! Suppose Mr. S. would try that expedient. In that cafe I need not fuggest that, any thing thort of a " good found dipping" all over, will be of any real utility. And then, should he, like the snake renewing its skin, cast his slough of ill-breeding, and drop his impenetrable armor of matchless effrontery, I shall be glad to address him, as a vulnerable antagonist; while he himself will have reason to rejoice in the happy metamorphofis, produced by fuch a blest bathing-bout!

+ As a proof of this, I cannot avoid noticing a piece of unparalleled mifrepresentation, by which in p. 35, of his renowned bit of patch-work, he would rescue a brother of his from the charge of bigotry. In my Reply to Parmenas, I mentioned the circumstance of an Anabaptist objecting to the purchase of Calvin's Institutes, because that great Reformer defended Infant-Baptisin. S. prodigiously enraged at the recital of a circumstance, which gave an additional specimen of that bigotry, for which Anabaptists in all their conduct are remarkable; and laboring to evade the force of the charge, fays, that "the individual referred to did not know that ever fuch a person as Servetus had existed." Nor did I infinuate he did; or that he refused to purchase the book, because Calvin opposed Servetus, as an Anabaptist individual. So that all S.'s abusive complaints here, arise from my having called Calvin's Defence of Infant-Baptism, by a fort of periphrasis, " his Opposition to Servetus, on the subject of Anabaptism." But S. denies the sact altogether, and fays his brother objected to the purchase "upon account of the price only." And yet he introduces him as querying whether Calvin was orthodox with respect to Infant-Baptism. Without staying to consider, how comes, from his malevolent pen, like a flab in the dark. A Clergyman! it feems, faid to him (p. 46.) "Sir, you hurt the poor man, by careffing him too much. I rejoice that from the first I neither blessed him at all, nor cursed him at all." In answer to this anonymous Clergyman! who, it feems, is of the neuter gender, I beg to know, (1) What he means by careffing; and whether he gave a toleration to Mr. S. as to an officious scribe, to publish this bit of private invective? If this fame Clergyman! has any thing to fay to me, and will favor me with an open address, I will be his obedient servant. But, if he only chuse to fight in the dark, and to put little fugitive fquibs in the hand of Mr. S. thereby manifestly employing him as a fcribbling cat'spaw, I shall treat the paw and the hand that uses it, with equal indifference. (2) When he fays, "that he neither bleffed me at all, nor curfed me at all," I am to be fure, much obliged to this modest Gentleman, for his fober neutrality. But has he not overshot himself here? I am either doing the work of the LORD in this place, or I am not. If the former, then furely I have reason far this ignorant querift or his equally-ignorant vindicator are capable of arraigning the orthodoxy of fo great a Reformer as "the bright taper of Geneva," I answer, the bookseller informed me that the modest querift "had been looking at the book, but did not approve of Calvin's sentiments with respect to Baptism; which he (the bookseller) supposed was the occasion of his not purchasing it." And, for the truth of this, we appeal, not to the querist's "oath," but to his conscience. So that, considering this ignorant Anabaptist had never read Calvin on Insant-Baptism; yet presumed to arraign his orthodoxy; and to resuse purchasing the Institutes, though offered at a very moderate price; it seems his grand latent objection was Calvin's opposition to the great Diana of Anabaptists.

to expect the divine bleffing. And if God blefs, fo should the righteous. But the witholding a bleffing, by observing a neutrality, is according to the determination of scripture, equivalent to a virtual curse. Balaam was fo struck with a sense of this, that, when the king of Moab wanted him, " neither to curse Ifrael at all, nor to bless them at all," the prophet durst not observe such a finful neutrality, but did emphatically bless them. So that from hence, it is plain, that the declaration of Mr. S.'s anonymous Clergyman refembles more the neutral impiety of Balak king of Moab, the anathematizing adversary of God's people, than the temporary uprightness of poor Balaam; and I request this same Gentleman and the retailer of his neutral curses, to go to Balaam, and learn a little piety, even from the forced honesty of the man, whose eyes were open. But, the truth is, I shrewdly suspect, that this neutral Gentleman, is the very identical anathematizer, that curfed the excellent fervices of our church: * and. if I am not wrong in my conjectures, I am perfeetly easy about his "careslings;" and beg Mr. Retailer would inform his imitator of Balak, that his curses are, to me, just as tremendous, as his blessings are desirable.

I would not, however, wish to infinuate, that I disregard the blessings of God's people. So far from it, that I shall be thankful to the meanest of his servants, for their prayers and pious benedictions. But the blessings of bigotry, which come from the donor's lips cold as ice; and the curses of uncharitableness, which fly like sparks from the sire of infernal zeal; are equally the objects of my indifference and contempt. If any persons will heartily bless me in my ministerial work, I will as heartily thank them. And if they will even curse me, positively, or neutrally, Balak-like; I hope I shall be enabled to give them nothing but blessings in return. But, whether I am an object of positive maledictions, positive blessings, or bigoted neutrality, I trust I shall still undauntedly persevere, in the strength of divine grace, to vindicate truth; and to approve myself in the eye of Him, who judgeth not as man judgeth.

C H A P. I.

The author vindicates himself and his friends, from Mr. M.'s groundless charges and illiberality of low abuse—proves that the DECLARATION, attested by ten Anabaptists, is tantamount to an indirect CHALLENGE—and expostulates with the "SEVERE OPPOSER" on his irreverent mode of attacking Infant-Baptism from the pulpit, and on his indelicate manner of abusing certain "endowed" ecclesiastics from the press.

REV. SIR,

Am glad you have, at last, condescended to favor me with an answer to my Vindication of Infant-Baptism; as well as to the Strictures, I took the liberty of making on the occasion and circumstances of your late visit to Shrewsbury. Hitherto, I have been engaged in some slight skirmishes, with a brace of controvertists, whose feeble efforts resemble water squirted against the wind, which returns upon the squirter's own sace, with a more violent repercussion. I rejoice therefore, that you have taken the controversial sword out of the hands of Messrs. Parmenas and Sandys; whom, whom, for distinction-sake, I style the twin-disputants, because of their prodigious resemblance to each other, in impotence of argument and profusion of low abuse; and, that having bid farewell to your two formidable seconds, I have now a fair opportunity of entering the lists with the Champion himself.

Several circumstances concurred to raise my expectations, antecedently to the actual appearance of your intended publication. The menacing intimations of your private letter; * the complimentary innuendos of your Salopian auxiliaries, and of your warm friend in Birmingham; added to the promissory pomp of your long-advertised title-page; all tended to excite my curiosity, and to increase my longings for a view of the formidable sheet-anchor. A christian friend, had, moreover, informed me, that you were determined to "give me a broad-side!" But, my disappointment is so great, that I hope I shall never, in future, pay the smallest serious regard, to such preparatory pusses. I have now ocular demonstration, that the long-expected piece of artillery, is by no means fo formidable, as my own imagination, or the encomiums of others, might have represented it. There is fo little, really terrific, in its whole appearance, that a very moderate adept in casuistry, might look, undifmayed, into the very mouth of this controverfial cannon, and stand, unhurt, the whole shock of its discharged contents. For, abstracted from the wideness of its orifice, and the loudness of its roar, it is vox et præterea nihil! And, if this be the tremendous piece of ordnance that is to give a "a broad-fide" to Pœdobaptism, and to do fuch prodigious execution amongst its advocates; I'm afraid, the iffue will prove, that there is as wide a difference between faying and accomplishing this, as between the mere noise of declamatory vociferation, and the powerful energy of close reasoning. And, as a ship, by aiming too precipitate and too vehement a broad-fide against an enemy, sometimes finks herself, by that very act which intended destruction to the contrary fide; fo, it may perhaps turn out, that fome of Mr. M.'s " broad-fides," have tended eventually to fink the cause he meant to defend.

^{*} Such as; "Give the fword into the hand of your informant. And "if he, she, or they, know the hilt from the point, let them use it."——Language this, such as one might have expected from a man blustering on a quarter-deck, or from a vaunting prize-fighter; but such as comes with no fort of grace from one, whose profession is that of a Minister of the Prince of peace; and, who, in various instances, does not himself know the hilt of the controversial fword from the point. It were much to be wished, that this vaunting Gentleman were better acquainted with the extent of his own abilities; and that he may, I carnessly recommend to his serious study, the sentiment contained in that celebrated adage production. "Till he makes a considerable improvement in the important study, it is more than probable, he will never wholly relinquish his challenging dialect; which at present, seems so familiar to him, almost epon every occasion.

You will pardon me, if I take the liberty to affirm, that, you are as unfortunate in the title, as I hope it will be, ere long, proved, you have been unfuccefsful, in the materials of your controverfial ordnance; and that the very face of your brazen mortar carries the impress of bigotry and error. When you intitle your piece "Intemperate Zeal reproved, and Christian Baptism defended,"

you take two things for granted, which I am unwilling to allow, and which you have not proved. For (1) that I have a "zeal" against Anabaptism and against some of its bigoted advocates, I readily acknowledge; but whether that zeal be "intemperate" or not, I think you cannot, under your present feelings, be a competent judge. You will please to recollect, that an author, whom you very well know, obferves, in his definition of zeal in general, that it is 'a strong internal fire, which makes a man burn with eagerness, for the accomplithment of whatever he is deeply interested in.' As I look upon myself, to be deeply interested in the cause of truth. I therefore burn with a zeal against error, which, not all the floods of calumny. I trust, shall ever be able to extinguish, or even damp. Now, Sir, as I verily believe you to be under the influence of error; and of such a species of error too, as constitutes one of the main pillars of bigotry; my zeal therefore burned with an ardent defire of firiking a scriptural blow at Anabaptisin; in order, that, when the principal prop was shaken, the fabric, it supported, might receive a shock too; and, as I observed Mr. M. to lean a little too confidently against the pillar, I therefore gave him a friendly alarm. In doing this, I am conscious, I have touched a very fore place. To attack Anabaptism, is, in the estimation of some of its warm devotees, the same as to touch the ark. And because I have made use of scriptural zeal, as a fort of caustic to eat away the proud fungous flesh, which grows from the gangrene grene of bigotry; and in the application, may have touched a tender part in Mr. M; hence this great out-cry against the "intemperance" of my zeal. * But, until you prove, which I am fure you cannot, that it has not been tempered with brotherly love towards you and the Anabaptists in general; all your heavy charges, on this part of the fubject, fall to the ground, like darts, that as foon as emitted, fnap in pieces, and never reach the mark. And as you have undertaken to "reprove" my zeal, permit me to observe, that, before you had engaged in the friendly office, you should have waited a full year at least, 'till your own zeal had cooled a little of its effervefcence. For, Lassure you, some persons think, it has blazed away fo much in the comet-style, that we fhould not be furprifed, if another milder phænomenon were to make its appearance, intitled by Mr. M.'s own pen, "The reprover's intemperance acknowledged, or an antidote to the fiery zeal of Anabaptifin."

(2) When you prefix to your publication, the pompous title of " Christian-Baptism Defended," I can only regret, that your printer did not for once commit a wilful erratum, and, for defended, substitute deserted. In that case, although the mistake might have administered not a little mortification to the defender, yet it would have communicated a real truth to the public. For, to call a weak Vindication of Anabaptism, a "Defence of Christian-Baptism," is at once to beg the question, and to exhibit a specimen of genuine bigotry. What! does Mr. M. affert, that, to reject the Baptism of Believers' Infant-seed, and to subflitute Adult-Dipping in its room, is to defend Christian Baptism? Does he also infinuate, that the ordinance can be effectually administered, only by a total immersion? Will he thus make a monopoly of Christian Baptism, by confining it to the limits of his own inconsiderable party, to the exclusion of all the reformed churches in the world? And, does he suppose, that there are no truly-baptized "Christians," and, consequently, no real Christian Churches, but among Anabaptifts? Are all the numerous communities of gofpel professors to be unchurched and virtually unchristianed, by Mr. M.'s uncharitable dogma? As these infinuations are displayed in the very front of his publication; it shall be my business, to prove them as destitute of truth, as they are replete with audacious bigotry.—As to the furreptitious motto, for which you are indebted to my tract on true and false zeal, I cannot help faying, that it is exhibited in a notorious misapplication. But, I dare fay, some judicious readers will know how to apply it to Mr. Fervidus, from Liverpool; whose "indignation" is now most dreadfully "awakened," because his fervid " party has been touched in a tender point;" and I dare fay the electrical shock, which which has roused his latent ire, will "fly like lightning through the whole fraternity;" if I may judge from the spirit of three electrical gentlemen, who have already savored me with address. To all such I earnessly recommend Jehu's Looking-Glass; hoping, that the hideous caricature of bigotry represented in that little mirror, will deter our modern Jehus from inlisting as volunteers under her siery banner: and, as I never met with an individual, who outstrips the surious drivers of all denominations, so completely, as Mr. M; I request, that he would not view his physiognomy in the glass, with a transient peep, less the should "straightway forget, what manner of person he is."

^{*} Mr. Baxter's excellent observation, respecting the Anabaptists of his day, is strictly applicable to Mr. M. "I found these men generally so tender-eared, and impatient of any discovery of their error; (though it be done by mere argument, without any reproach,) that it did but hurt them, and sill them with prejudice against the speaker," (or writer;) "for they took him for an enemy, if not a persecutor, that told them the truth."

After forming a fort of poor parody on my introduction, you proceed to open the orifice of your formidable piece of ordnance. It's first difcharge is announced, by a tremendous roar of fevere abuse, at those pious friends, who brought me fome minutes of your late exceptionable harangues on dipping. These persons you are pleased to call p. 4, "malevolent infidious tale-bearers;" which epithet, according to your wonted abufive tautology, is twice repeated again in the space of a few lines. The fame persons you go on in the fame page, to flyle "detested informers, stealers;" me you rank among the "ready and greedy tale-hearers, and tale-receivers." In p. 5, the vehement roar is continued against my friends, whom, in a little variation of your tautological invective, you call "whining, religious busy-bodies, backbiting talebearers, religious firebrands, incendiaries, Salopian H 2 budget-budget-bearers of falshoods and misrepresentations, p. 13:" while to confummate the whole of this abufive shock, you call me, "a precipitate, rash, hotheaded young man," throwing out "plenty of backbiting falshoods, invidious reproaches, and malicious Ineers:" p. 10.

Now, Sir, what is it that can awaken your indignation to fuch a pitch, as to inspire your pen with all this crambe repetita, reiterated hotch-potch of low abuse? Is it the simple circumstance of fome persons having brought me extracts from your fermon, and of my having animadverted on them before the public? If this be the principal ground of your wrath, I will endeavor to mitigate it a little, and to defend myfelf and friends, against its angry overflowings.

I. I cannot fee, that either the bearer or receiver of notes from a public discourse is justly reprehensible, where there is no design of misrepresentation. Upon looking over the presatory apology to Mr. Baxter's " Plain Scripture-Proof of Infants' Church-membership and Baptism," I find, that, preparatory to his public difpute at Bewdley, with Mr. Tombes, the Anabaptist, he commissioned some persons to take down notes of Mr. T.'s sermons; and yet I do not learn, that the preacher ever abused either Mr. Baxter or his friends for so doing, in the fourrilous dialect Mr. M. has accosted us. Thus far the Anabaptist of Liverpool has excelled his brother of Bewdley; but, whether it be fuch a fuperior excellence as redounds to the credit of the former, the reader is to judge.-If it be a crime fo very heinous, to take down and animadvert on public declamations; then what thall we style the notaries, that attend the houses of parliament, and communicate either memoriter, or by short-hand notes, the principal excerpta from the speeches of our declaiming Lords and Commons? Must not they according to Mr. M.'s exprobatory logic, be a fet of "detefted informers, stealers, infidious tale-bearers, &c." And must not the public, who receive these extracts, (not even Mr. M. himself excepted) be a vast body of " greedy tale-hearers and tale-receivers?" Thus Mr. M.'s abuse of my friends, when applied univerfally, will affect all the notaries of public declamation in the world; while his complimentary invective against me, ultimately falls on his own head .- When he styles my friends "insidious" talebearers, he either does not understand the meaning of his own abusive phraseology, or, if he does, he infinuates, that they had meditated a defigned plot against him, in which I might have had an insidious hand; an infinuation, as false, as it is injurious. They went as ferious, not infidious hearers. But, being grievously disappointed, they could not help expressing their disappointment; the ground of which, I have animadverted on before the public.

II. In a misapplied note, p. 6, which you have borrowed from my tract on true and false zeal, you infinuate, that "prejudice, envy, slander, pride, jealousy, &c." actuated my friends in reporting, and me, in publishing the extracts from your fermon.

But here permit me, to observe, that the fact which I condemn in your quotation, respects either "inoffensive expressions," or the private "miscarriage" of an individual, and the uncharitable mode of exagerating all the circumstances of fuch a misfortune, fo as to unchristian the unhappy fubject. But, this, fo far from admitting a parallel in the present case, exhibits a glaring contrast. For (1) your expressions on the subject of Anabaptism, were not "inoffensive;" they offended against the laws of modesty, candor, and christian moderation. Therefore, to animadvert on these offenfive effusions, does not in the least come under the predicament of, what you call "the envenomed bitings of a ferpent." (2) The cenfure in your quotation respects the private miscarriage of an individual. But my reprehensions concern the violations of truth and candor, PUBLISHED in the presence of hundreds. (3) The case in my Fehu supposes, that the scene was contrived in the dark: but, my frank declarations in a letter to Parmenas, which was immediately transmitted to Liverpool antecedent to my publication, prove, that my strictures were managed and published with much less fecrecy, than pamphlets in general are laid before the public. So that, when your borrowed note fays, that the culprit "hears not a word" of the intended reprehension, you are conscious, that it contains a manifest failure in the accommodation of circumstances: for you did "hear a word" about the matter, both from my letter to P. and from another to yourfelf. (4) The " sentence of sentence of condemnation" blamed in the note, is fuch, as does not "ftop in its career, till it unchristian the man," who is the object of a judging temper. This last clause you have studiously omitted, that you might give an air of plaufibility to your borrowed reprefentation; and, by thus mangling the paffage, you keep the principal point out of view, which I condemn; and which, you know, I never applied to Mr. M. Therefore, until you can prove that my friends and I have iffued out fuch a "fentence of condemnation" as absolutely "judges" and "unchristians" you; the whole of this borrowed scene, fails in the principal parts of its accommodation, while the mifapplication of it exhibits the difingenuity and impertinence of the applier.

III. You urge, as a ground for feveral complaints, that I never "heard" the exceptionable parts of your late harangues. I wish I had been an ear-witness to them, if it were for no other reason, than that I might thereby have saved my friends that superabundance of vulgar invective, wherewith you have loaded them. However, as your auxiliary in Birmingham has infinuated, that I was "too stiff" to be one of your auditors, and others may suppose the infinuation to be grounded on fact; I take this opportunity of informing that gentleman, that I am not restrained by such a tight rein of church-bigotry, as to shun hearing any man of any denomination, who preaches the gospel; and I gave a proof of this in going to hear Mr. M. It happened not to be the evening of famous memory, on which he exhibited all the artillery of his witticifins, ridicule, and logic, against Infant-baptism. But from the observations I then made on the preacher's peculiar address, I can eafily conjecture, what a rapid flood of unmeaning declamation he poured forth, when his heart was warmed with his favorite topic on cold water. For, when the preacher could indulge fuch frequent fallies of ridiculous wit, on fubjects of the most folemn nature; how exuberant, thought I, must this indulgence have been, when he expatiated on points of leffer moment! my own part, whether water-baptism or baptism of the Holy Ghost be the subject, I think the matter and manner of the speaker ought always to betray the most profound reverence, if he would wish to excite devotional feriousness in his audience. But, when little vulgarisms, "wit that can creep," ridiculous flights of fancy, jocular fimiles, are interspersed with truths of infinite importance; can we be furprifed that an auditory thould be thrown into an unferious titter? that the truly-pious thould go away chagrined and disappointed? that scoffers should be eventually hardened in their impiety? and that the gospel of of the bleffed God should suffer additional contempt and difesteem, from fuch irreverent jocularity? And can we suppose, that ordinances conducted fo irreverently, will be crowned with a divine bleffing, or tend to real edification? Examine the character of Him, who "fpake as never man fpake;" review the writings of his inspired apostles:

apostles; and then judge, whether the discourses of the one, or the epistolary exhortations of the other, are in any parts of them calculated to promote levity. Whenever Mr. M. afcends the pulpit, in order to deliver the truths of the gospel, or to harangue on his favorite topic; I would advise him to preserve in his mind the idea of the compassionate Jesus weeping over bloody Ferufalem; -- of Abraham, importunately pleading in all the reverence and pathos of fervent prayer, in behalf of Sodom and Gomorrah; -- of Moses, in a solemn appeal to heaven and earth, calling God, angels and men to record against a rebellious people;of Fonah, crying to the impenitent Ninevites, with all the earnestness of a man, who preaches for eternity; -of John the Baptist, lifting up his voice like a trumpet in the wilderness, and, in language, rough as his clothing, sharp as the piercings of a fword, and folemn as the grave, warning a proud and bigoted people to flee from the wrath to come; of the intrepid Paul, delivering himself with fuch cogency of perfuafive argument, and folemnity of faithful address, as to make even Agrippa himself an almost-christian, and to excite horror in the feared confcience of an avaritious and adulterous Felix; -- I fay, if Mr. M. will but preserve in his mind, the idea of these personages, thus engaged in their respective exercites of reverential prayer, compassionate address, and solemn declamation, I dare fay it will tend greatly to prevent the intrusion of every light and irreverent thought; confequently will refcue his diction from

from the froth of jocular phraseology; will introduce a becoming awe into his fermons and prayers; and will preserve the ordinances of God from that levity, which makes them sometimes resemble a comic entertainment more than an awful intercourse with heaven.

Thus, Sir, you have virtually necessitated me to drop a few salutary hints, that very intimately concern you, as a preacher of the gospel. This I should have avoided out of tenderness to yourself, had you not by a variety of bold interrogatories, virtually called upon me to declare, that, though I did not hear you on dipping, I did on other subjects: and, that from the specimen I then had of your manner, I can conceive, the half was not told me respecting your humorous declamations on your darling topic. However, from the information of my friends, I take the liberty to expostulate with you before the public, as I did, in a private letter you received from me. "You seem ex-

[†] Jerom gives an admirable piece of advice to those who minister in holy things. Docente in ecclefia te, non CLAMOR populi, fed GEMITUS fuscitetur: LACHRYME auditorum laudes tuc funt. On which, the words of good Mr. Baxter, will form a fort of excellent paraplirafe. "I know not how it is with other persons, but the most reverent preacher, who speaks as though he faw the face of God, does more affect my heart, than an irreverent man, with the most accurate preparations, though he lawl it out with much feeming earnestucis. If reverence be not equal to fervency, it has but little effect. Of all preaching in the world, I hate that most, which tends to make the hearers LAUGH; or to affect their minds, with fuch levity, as flage-plays do, instead of affecting them with an holy reverence of the name of God. We should suppose, (as it were) when we draw near him in holy things, that we faw the throne of God, and the millions of glorious angels attending him, that we may be AWED with his majesty; lest we prophase his service, and take his name in vain." Baxter's Reformed Pastor, abridged, p. 182.

ecedingly warm, from a supposition that I have misrepresented you; because in my letter to Mr. P. (as well as in my Letter to a Baptist-Minister,) I fay you "held up those ministers who differ from you, in a ludicrous point of view." And I fay fo fill, Sir. Let your own ludicrous animadversions testify. Did you not ask your audience (with a defign to ridicule the dispensers of baptism by affusion) whether "the sprinkling their pots and cups would cleanse them?" Did you not say, that those who do not practise immersion, "only baptize the ends of their fingers?" Did you not ridicule the custom of sending for a minister to baptize a fick child? And did not the censure, which affects the parents, confequently affect the officiating minister? Did you not even descend so low, as to ridicule those prints, which represent the Baptist as pouring the baptismal water on CHRIST? Did you not severely animadvert on a part of the office for baptism in the Church of England?-Now, Sir, although, in these witticisms, you mentioned no minister's name, yet furely you ridiculed their office. So that, when you reprefented baptifin by affusion, as fimilar to the " fprinkling of pots," or as nothing more than " baptizing the ends of the fingers," did you not indirectly "hold up, in a ludicrous point of view, those ministers, who differ from you?" Indeed you did, Sir. And I appeal to your own candor, whether all your loud complaints of mifrepresentation are not sheltered under an evasive distinction, between ridiculing ministers' persons, and bantering 1 2

bantering their mode of dispensing baptism. I fancy, if I had introduced your peculiarities into the pulpit, and had ludicrously expatiated on the scene exhibited at the Abbey-Foregate Bath; you would have thought yourself "held up in a ludicrous point of view," though I never mentioned the name of Mr. M. or the word minister at all.

V. In the fame letter, in which I prefented Mr. M. with these expostulatory queries, I also told him, "I was informed, he gave a challenge to the advocates for Infant-Baptifm, and would engage to answer all that should be faid on the fubject." As he favored me with no reply to my letter, I looked upon his filence as a fort of tacit acknowledgment of the declaration; and, in my Reply to Parmenas, took the liberty to expose this. pompous mode of introducing virtual challenges into the facred desk. His friends, zealous for the honor of their champion, and looking upon my strictures as a dreadful misrepresentation, seem to have called a ferious meeting, in order to vindicate their friend, and to attest his innocence, Accordingly, his possfcript exhibits a list of ten Anabaptists, with the important Mr. Sandys at the head, who declare Mr. M. never gave fuch a challenge, and fubscribe their names to this attested declaration.

Now, although the pompous postfcript is authenticated by the names of these Anabaptist Decemviri, and particularly graced with the signature of a Reverend Decemvir; yet I will take upon me to prove, even from the acknowledgments of the attesting junto, junto, that Mr. M. did give a virtual challenge to Poedobaptists; and that the style of it is tantamount to a declaration, that "he would answer whatever should be said on the subject of Infant-Baptism." Let us take an attentive view of the ATTESTED CHALLENGE.

"If the Pædobaptists will prove their practice from the word of God, (which in my humble opinion they never yet have done,) I will attentively and impartially READ, whatever they (N.B.) may produce: and if they convince me from the scripture, that Insant-Sprinkling is Gospel-Baptism, I! Samuel Medley! do pledge myself to make a public recanta ion of my present opinion, from the pulpit and the press, and to become a zealous defender of Insant-Baptism, wherever I am, and as long as I live." Witness, &c.

Now, in opposition to this, I might urge, the declaration of a respectable Disserter, whose single testimony, both in point of veracity and recollection, I deem more than a counter-ballance to the attested acknowledgment of the Anabaptist Decemviri. The person referred to, declares, that to the best of his recollection (and he thinks his recollection could not fail him, for he listened with uncommon attention to the whole of this vaunting hiatus) Mr. M. did totidem verbis " pledge himself to answer all that should be said on the subject of Infant-Baptism."

felves, I am willing to abide by the style of the declaration itself. I That it is to all intents, a challenge, will, I believe, appear obvious at the first fight, to any person of candor and discernment; but more fo, if we confider the exact analogy between the tenor of the declaration and Dr. Fohnfon's definition of the word challenge. "To challenge" (fays the eminent lexicographer) " is to call another to answer for an offence by combat." Mr. M. thinks Infant-Baptism an "offence" against scripture: He "calls" on modern Pædobaptists from the pulpit "to answer" for this offence, as he intimates that their brethren, in former times, "never have proved their practice from the word of God:" and he virtually calls upon them to do this in controversial "combat" by "PRODUCING" their defensive proofs; which can only be done from the pulpit or the press. I leave the reader to judge, from this correspondence between the lexicographer's definition and Mr. M.'s declaration, whether the latter does not carry with it the appearance of a pulpit-challenge.

2. That Mr. M. did virtually pledge himself to answer whatever should be said by Pædobaptists, will appear, if we consider (1) That he afferts they "never have" hitherto "proved their practice from the word of God;" consequently that those, who have never done this, may be easily answered: (2) That, as they have hitherto sailed, he calls upon them, to prove their practice now; which, by a sneering infinuation, implies, (notwithstanding his affected pretensions to impartiality,) that they would be as fuccessful in future as heretofore; and therefore as easily answered. (3) That "whatever they may produce" (another mode of challenging them to do it) he would condescend to "READ." Is not this a virtual calling upon them to publish? (4) That, if "convinced" by their arguments, he "pledges" himself to make a public recantation, from the pulpit and the press, although, by the specimen he has already given us, we may easily judge, how accessible he is to conviction, and how much disposed to make a

Now, I only ask any person of candor and impartiality, if for a pulpit-orator to throw out innuendos concerning "whatever" Pædobaptists "MAY PRODUCE" be not a virtual fummons, or a species of challenge to the field of controversy. And, if this fame person, declares, by a solemn pledging of his important I! S. M! that, if convinced, he will publish his recantation; I should be glad to know, what we are to suppose he would do, when all our arguments are lost upon him. Does his declaration imply, that he would ONLY " read whatever we may produce?" and that he would never attempt, at least, any answer to our publications? Does it not rather, plainly infinuate, that, as he would publish his recantation from the pulpit and the press, if convinced of the fcripture-ground of Infant-Baptifin; fo, if not convinced, he would adopt fome public mode of declaring his opposition. For, I repeat it again; we can never suppose, without flying in the face of reviewer of our fentiments. Let the religious buffoonery, with which, though unprovoked, he lately attacked Infant-Baptism, and the dogmatic affurance, wherewith he exalted Anabaptism, bear witness, how far our productions would be likely to receive a candid, modest, or silent examination. So that, I am fully convinced, (and the conviction is founded on implicit proof) that, Mr. M. did, either expressly, according to the information of my friend, or tacitly, according to the face of the attested declaration, say he would engage to answer whatever should be urged by Pædobaptists.

· VI. And now, Sir, permit me to exposulate with you once more, upon a review of your conduct. Do you really think, that your late manner of treating your differing brethren, is strictly defensible? Is it consistent with decency, to scatter abroad your little ludicrous witticifins, when you are engaged in the folemnities of public worship? Does it betray any genuine modesty, to deliver yourfelf with fuch dogmatic confidence, on a fubject, which you do not feem fufficiently to understand? And is it any mark of self-distidence, to conclude with fuch peremptorinefs, that Pædobaptists " never have yet proved their practice from. God's word?" Are you a competent judge of the merits of the controversy, to be able to determine a point, which Anabaptists of much superior abilities, have found fo very difficult to prove? Or do you suppose that your mere affirmation is to weigh weigh heavier, than the arguments of "ten men that can render a reason?" If you must give your opinion, respecting your own peculiarities; can't you do this, without exhibiting the contrary fide in all the parade of ludicrous declamation? Is the facred desk a proper place for such exhibitions? Is the celebration of a folemn ordinance. a time, proper for fuch levity? And should a promiscuous audience, confisting perhaps of prophane more than professors, be eye and ear-witnesses to such trifling irreverence? Is, it the part of modesty, candor, politeness or moderation, after roundly afferting, that Pædobaptists have failed in all their attempted vindications of Infant-Baptism, to give them a virtual challenge to "produce" fomething for the vaunting challenger's perusal? And, is it any mark of ingenuity, or openness to conviction, after a man has been called to an account for giving a challenge from the pulpit, to fly to the poor subterfuge, of getting a few partial friends to attest a declaration, which only exculpates him from uttering certain words, when it manifeftly implies the fentiment, I have exposed?

Suppose, Sir, that I had been invited to Liver-pool, as you have been lately, to Shrewsbury: That all the inhabitants of Liverpool, (a few only excepted) were Anabaptists; and that Pædobaptists there, like your brethren in this town, were Dissenters:—That, upon accepting the invitation, I had taken an opportunity of preaching, and of baptizing:—That, in the course of my fermon, and at the time of administering the ordinance, I had availed myfelf of a double occasion, to ridicule the fentiments and ordinances of the establishment:-That I had, in a cluster of low fimiles, ridiculed the Anabaptists for making their "watery grave" essential baptism:-That I had, with a low sneer, asked, in a public ordinance, whether the "wrapping their pots "and cups in cloths, and then putting them " under water, would be a more probable mode " of cleanfing them, than by an affusion of " water:"-That I had laughed at Anabaptists, for taking long journeys, to dip persons in the depth of winter, pregnant women not even excepted; as if they deemed immersion essential to falvation: - Suppose I had proceeded farther, roundly to affirm that " Anabaptists had never yet proved their practice from the word of God;" that I gave them a virtual challenge to "produce" fomething from the press, and that I would take upon me to answer the production: -Suppose, Sir, I say, that I had conducted myself thus, in the delivery of my public discourses, and at the administration of the ordinance of baptism; in what an unamiable light must I have appeared, to the candid and judicious, either as a preacher or an administrator! What would the WORLD have thought of me? What! but that I went to Liverpool, only to exhibit a little pulpit-buffoonery, in order to make one part of my hearers laugh: - What would the Padobaptists have thought of me? What! but that I had strangely forgot my errand; that, instead of preaching Christ and him crucified, I had only defigned to preach felf; and that, inflead of urging the

the "one baptism," I wanted to amuse them with a little dry declamation on cold water.—What would the Clergy of Liverpool have thought? What! but that I went there, as a fort of declaiming gladiator, to give a virtual challenge to any who chose to take up the gauntlet:—What would the Anabaptists have thought? What! but that I meant to fill their heads with doubts, their united assemblies with confusion, and their differing brethren with contemptible bigotry.—Yea, what would Mr. M. himself have thought? What! but that, relinquishing the catholicism of the man of moderation, and the pacific tenderness of the christian, I had taken a long journey to give him a virtual insult in his own neighbourhood.

But even this mode of reprefenting, mutatis mutandis, the difingenuity of Mr. M.'s conduct, does not take in all the fubfequent aggravations in it. For, besides attempting a vindication, he has now informed us, that we are totally mistaken in the mode of administering baptism. Thus dogmatizes Mr. Medley. "I still think, that none of the " ministers in the established church, or among " the dissenters, do administer baptism in a scrip-" tural manner."--If our Pædobaptist brethren are affected by this gentleman's thoughts; in the fame manner with myfelf, they will deem them as remote from truth, as they are from modesty; and will naturally expect annual vifits from the thinker himself, since he holds so very cheap all the unscriptural administrators of baptism, in Shrewsbury. However, as fecond thoughts are best, and as the wifest of men have seen the utility of them; who knows but Mr. M. may think differently in the year 1777? At least, one would fondly hope, that he would think, and preach, and write, a little more Modestly. For, if the space of several months, and another exposulation from the press, do not produce such a desirable change, I know what somebody will think; viz: that bigotry is a thick cloud impervious to every ray of light; that effrontery is a coat of mail impenetrable by the keenest arrows of argumentative reproof; and that some people's thoughts, like the reveries of one in a dream, are destitute of regularity, solidity, and truth.

VII. Not content with dogmatizing on Poedobaptism, he abuses some Padobaptists, in a strain, which by an unhappy fatality, involves the abuser himself in a reverberating censure. Having in my Letter to a Baptist-Minister, dropped the most candid declaration, respecting Dissenters, and the happy privileges they possess under the wing of a "gracious toleration;" instead of improving this declaration to my honor, he, on the contrary, avails himself of an occasion to accost me with an address, that contains in it such personality of abuse, as characterizes neither the gentleman nor the christian. Having in p. 8, advertised the reader of my "advancement! to the Vicarage of St. Alkmond's," he renews and expatiates on the advertisement in p. 10; where, like the abusive counterpart of his auxiliary in Salop, he thus inveighs .-The only difference between the Diffenters and 66 the

" the Church of England, is, that the latter is " endowed with fat livings, To! puff up the pride " of certain Vicars, THAT! they may despise their " unendowed brethren. I think" (pray mind; these are his thoughts for 1776; but perhaps he may alter them, at some future lucid interval;) " it must naturally occur" (in consequence of a natural bright thought) "to a discerning reader". (but where shall we find readers as discerning as the THINKER?) "acquainted with all the circum-" stances" (a mysterious innuendo, which I hope the thinker will explain) " of a certain author," (whose real name he has been so polite as never to mention but in his title-page) * " what an amazing " contrast" (especially when exhibited by our thinker's amazing pen) "the humble Curate of Shaw-" bury was to the prieftly" (an erratum for proud) " Vicar of St. Alkmond's!"

Here I might leave our amazing thinker, peaceably to enjoy his thoughts for the present A. D. were it not that I think it possible he may, even before the present year is elapsed, either change his thoughts, or at least the coarse phraseology, that cloathes them. For this reason I will spend a sew strictures on a passage, which seems to be the result of prosound cogitation. (1) When Mr. M. says, that the "only difference between Dissenters and the Church of England, is, that the latter is endowed;" does not his cogibundity, here, take a nod? For if that were the only difference, I should not now be writing against him as an oppugner of Insant-Baptism. (2) Though some of the livings in the Church of England are "fat," yet there are numbers of them very lean; the incumbents of which endure as great, if not much greater hardships, than many unendowed Anabaptists. (3) That large emoluments abused " puff up the pride" of some ecclefiastics, is too notorious to be denied. But that our Church is endowed "To!" augment their pride, is just as good sense and found truth, as to fay, that "Anabaptism is unendowed, To! enhance the humility of certain Antipædobaptifts." (4) That our Church is endowed "THAT! certain Vicars may despise their unendowed brethren," is an end, which the original endowers themselves as much thought of, as that our unendowed thinker would ever fabricate fuch invidious nonsense. (5) When Mr. M. would infinuate, that certain ecclefiastics on corpulent benefices (which I'm fure, thus far, happens not to be my case) are puffed up with pride, and with contempt of their brethren; he feems to form a fort of connexion, in idea, between corpulency and pride, as if they were homogeneous; or, as if endowment, pride and contempt, formed a kind of ecclefiastical Cerberus, whose triple mouth is opened in hideous expansion against Diffenters. But here Mr. M.'s pencil draws a caricature, which exists only in his frighted imagination. Ecclesiastical endowment is not the monster, he would represent it; nor does it naturally engender those twin-fisters, contempt and pride. There are many en-dowed sons of our Church, whose humility, and respect for differing brethren, are extremely conspicuous.

fpicuous. * And, permit me to observe, that I myself know some unendowed individuals, who assume a greater air of self-importance, despotic church-authority, visible elation of spirit, and appearance of pomp, than many whom Mr. M. may salsy accuse of priestly pride. Qui alteros incusat,

Notwithstanding the multiplied shifts, Mr. M. has adopted, in order to elude the charges, I have brought against him, respecting his severe and ludicrous mode of attacking Infant-Baptism; I am glad, however, to meet with a concession, p. 38, which implicitly admits the whole of these charges, as well as points out the determinations of his suture conduct. "As to human traditions, &c. "I confess I have OFTEN made free with them," (another mode of expression for having freely abused Infant-Baptism) " and I will give neither

^{*} I will not, however, take upon me, to promise that Mr. M. will be the object of fuch respect, unless he should improve very rapidly in a science, with which he seems at present to be perfectly unacquainted. When a man descends to the scurrilous mode of abusing, without any just provocation, the Ministers of the established Church, upon a suppolition, that the eccleliaftical endowment which provides for their maintenance, makes intentional provision also for their pride; must not the fabricator of fuch impertinent infinuations fink in the esteem of every man of candor and good fense? When this Gentleman represents " certain Vicars" as " puffed up with pride," I should be glad to know, whether it be any proof of our haughtiness, that we take any notice of his low-lived imputations, or of his humility, that he coins them. Certain I am, this unendowed Anabaptist is so puffed up with a certain diforder, that, if the gentle puncture of a controverfial lancet does not penetrate the bladder of pomposity, and give vent to its inflating contents; by the time he writes again, the tumor will probably have arrived at fuch a prodigious degree of magnitude, as to render the poor patient an almost incurable pomposo: and, that he will then be a possessor of a PLUMP ENDOWMENT, I believe there will be no occasion to advertife the humble reader.

"bond nor promise, that I may not happen, to "do so again before I die." But, this Gentleman, who will not engage that he may not "happen" to pour forth his abuse in suture, drops his casual dialect, and gives us fair warning, in the following tremendous intimation, which he has backed with an explicit bond and promise. "If ever I am "again called, to defend the ordinance and recommend the practice of believer's baptism, "either at Sh—y or elsewhere; you may ALWAYS expect to hear of me as a SEVERE OPPOSER of the human invention, &c."

Now, candid reader, I request you will please to keep in mind this promissory note of our menacing opponent; because the recollection of it will help you to judge, of what nature Mr. M.'s recent harangues at Shrewsbury were; and whether his own concession here has not fully justified my animadversions upon them. As to his engaging, by a promissory bond, to be a "fevere opposer" of Infant-Baptism, if you divest his opposition of a mass of wordy tautology, overbearing confidence, mere ipse dixit, low abuse, &c. I assure you, there is nothing in the "opposer" which even a novitiate in divinity need to dread: And, if Anabaptism could furnish advocates, no more formidable than Mr. M. I think the Anabaptists themselves would tremble for their great Diana.—Should he favor us with any more vifits, and reiterate his " fevere opposition" in the style and manner, of which he has given a late specimen; and should any Pœdobaptists be ear-witnesses to the ludicrous and irreverent scene; instead of sneering, probably they " will stand PITYING by." For my own part, I am forry to be under a necessity of reminding Mr. M. that an inspired apostle mentions some bigoted cotemporaries of his day, who "preached CHRIST even of firife and contention." As I think fuch a mode of preaching is subversive of peace, and destructive to the real interests of the gospel. I am extremely concerned, that there should be any apparent fimilarity between Mr. M.'s fpirit and that of the contentious declaimers in St. Paul's days. And, if he should appear in this town again, in the character of a "fevere opposer," tho' I shall rejoice, like the catholic apostle, that "Christ will be preached," yet it will be an additional affliction to me, that the preacher should be a warm imitator of the fons of strife. I have been accused by an Anabaptist, of being "not content with my own watch and ward." But, whether a man's taking a long journey in order to disturb the neighbourhood of gospel-ministers, in the formidable style of a "fevere opposer" does not come under the above predicament, I leave the judicious reader to determine.

C H A P. II.

Mr. M.'s doctrine of the ESSENTIALITY of dipping exposed and refuted——His explanatory vindications on that head incur additional absurdity, and glaring self-contradiction——Animadversions on his calling the Church of England the "daughter of the mother of abominations."——The defamatory appellation, when transferred to the Ministers of our Church, proved to be inconsistent either with truth, or decency.——Some QUERIES proposed to Anabaptists.

HE unscriptural stress, which Anabaptists in general lay on dipping, induced me to express my fears on this head, to Mr. M. in particular. His manner of expatiating on the Eunuch's baptism, mentioned in Acts viii. 28, first laid the ground of my apprehenfions; and his explanatory reply, fo far from removing, has only tended to enhance them the more abundantly. Indeed all this gentleman's explanations only thicken in the clearing; and his felf-vindications refemble the efforts of a man fallen into a gravel-pit, and striving to rise; but in vain; for the loosened soil eludes the climber's grafp, and makes every attempt to emerge from his embarrassed situation productive of a fresh and more confirmed fall. In this fituation I often find Mr. Medley. His own false reasoning is the pit of absurdity into which his precipitate zeal has hurried him. I fly, with friendly eagerness to the pit's mouth, and gently propose propose a scriptural ladder to help him out of his embarrassment. Enraged that I should detect him in so humiliating a situation, he storms from the bottom at me, as if I had been the agent in his sall: and, when I expostulate with him on the dirtiness as well as danger of his situation, he rages still more, and lays the whole charge against what he calls, my "daubs of the black-brush;" p. 14, whereas, the daubing, so thick upon his garments, is occasioned by the accumulated dirt he contracts in his repeated falls, and disappointed attempts to rise; which is still encreased by the proportionate ponderosity of the body that tumbles. Take a remarkable instance of this nature in the following circumstance.

I. In p. 13, of my "Letter" I expressed my apprehensions, that Mr. M. made the Eunuch's baptism the ground of his joy, either in whole or in part, and that his mind had been legalized upon a favorite occasion. Here I drew a bow at a venture: and the fortuitous arrow has hit the mark: the wounded Anabaptist, in his attempts to pull it out, eventually drives it deeper, and enlarges the wound: while the unextracted dart pierces bigotry's coat of mail, enters the very heart of Anabaptism, and makes its bigoted advocate fret prodigiously. Upon my calmly hoping, that Mr. M. could not think "the Eunuch's joy was the truer " BECAUSE he was baptized," he proposes the following answer. "I do think the Eunuch's joy was " more TRULY frengthened, more TRULY enlarg-" ed, more TRULY heightened and brightened, and more

"more TRULY fealed and confirmed in the expe"rience of his foul in confequence of the divine

" rience of his foul in confequence of the divine " bleffing and prefence attending him, in his fub-

" mission to the divinely instituted ordinance;

" which submission was an effential part in the

"obedience of his faith." p. 14.

That "the divine prefence and bleffing" can strengthen, enlarge, and heighten a believer's joy, is a truth not to be controverted: and, if I thought Mr. M.'s theological jargon was intended to inculcate nothing more, I should give him my hearty concurrence in the observation. But he makes this divine prefence and bleffing an infeparable attendant on the outward ceremony of baptifm; and a fubmission to that ordinance he represents as an effential adjunct in the Eunuch's obedience of faith. So that, although by afcribing the enlargement of the Eunuch's joy to the divine bleffing, he has craftily devised a fort of cafuiftical loop-hole, from whence to escape the vigorous attack of an opponent; yet it is plain, that he makes the strengthening, enlarging, heightening, brightening, sealing, and confirming of spiritual joy, ultimately to depend on his submission to baptism; an infinuation this, big with the very quinteffence of legality, and calculated to puff up the pride of Anabaptists, as well as to strengthen, enlarge, heighten, brighten, feal, and confirm their bigoted attachment to dipping.

But, that I may expose the fallacy, absurdity, and error, couched with plausible artifice, under this whole passage, I lay before the judicious reader.

reader, the following observations. (1) When Mr. M. afferts, that the Eunuch's joy was " MORE " brightened and confirmed" upon his fubmission to baptism; does he not attribute more to this submisfive act, than to the energy of the Ethiopian's antecedent faith? Does he not thereby manifestly exalt a creature-work, a mere non-effential, not into an equality with, but into an absolute superiority above that grace, without which it is imposfible to please God? The scriptures of truth speak of "joy in believing," Rom. xv. 13. of "the joy of " faith," Phil. i. 25. And they continually intimate, that as believers owe the commencement ofdivine joy to the lively exertion of faith, fo they do likewise the continuance and firength of every inward confolation, to the same powerful grace. And, because it is the felf-abasing peculiarity of faith, to rest only upon the Lord Fesus Christ for pardon and acceptance, and to eye him as the fountain and foundation of every bleffing in time and eternity, in contradiffinction to the proud claims of pharifaifin and hypocrify; therefore the the true believer's joy is called "a joy in God, a " rejoicing in Christ Fesus," Rom. v. 11. Phil. iii. 3. But how does this fcriptural reprefentation of the matter comport with Mr. M.'s views? He makes the enlargement and confirmation of spiritual joy to refult from a submission to an outward ceremony; yea, he afferts that it is "more" enlarged thereby. Well, for my own part, it feems evident to me, as well from scripture as matter of fact, that, where fuch an undue stress is placed on externals, ternals, the foul, instead of being enlarged, becomes the subject of legal contraction; and the joy, instead of being strengthened, suffers an ensee-

(2) But, Mr. M. afferts that the Eunuch's joy was more truly strengthened, &c. And lest we should overlook the emphatic word, he repeats his "TRU-Ly" fix times. By the addition of this small dissylable, the error is still more truly strengthened, enlarged, heightened, brightened, sealed and confirmed. For, here is an explicit infinuation, that there was fome defect in the truth as well as the Arength of the Eunuch's joy, 'till he was baptized. Now, as Mr. M. is professedly an advocate for dipping as the effential mode of baptizing, and for adult-dipping as effential to the obedince of faith; and as he propofes the Eunuch as an example for both effentials; he confequently must think, (yea he implicitly declares) that the joy of undipped believers is neither fo true nor fo strong, as that of those, who submit, to what he is pleafed to call, "a divinely inftitut-" ed ordinance." And, the plain English of this unscriptural infinuation is, that the joy of Anabaptists, and of them alone, is truly strong and bright. Had I not reason then, in my letter, to ask Mr. M. if he thought "the Eunuch's joy was the truer, because he was baptized?" And has he not now given me fuch an answer, as abundantly confirms my former apprehensions respecting the legality of our author's fentiments? I confess this is a brightening of the fubject, that I never expected from an evangelical pen. And I am not in the least furprifed, prifed, that those who fit under fuch tenets, and fubmit to dipping, from an imbibed supposition. that their fubmission to this ceremony will "more " truly strengthen" their joy; I am not surprised, I fay, that fuch perfons should place their joy in dipping, rather than in believing; that, from a delusory dependence on a mere opus operatum, they should mistake the shadow for the substance; and that they should live and die utter strangers to the power of godliness. Nor am I in the least furprised, if some Anabaptists, should be hereby so fwoln with spiritual pride, as to look with contempt on their brethren, and to fancy themselves the only possessors of the "truth, joy, and essence of " obedient faith."-Suppose a happy Pædobaptist, rejoicing in God his Savior, and triumphing in the victorious faith of his elect, were to meet with one of Mr. M.'s hearers, and from the overflowing abundance of his heart were to declare the great things God had done for his foul. According to our author's doctrine, the Anabaptist should make the following answer. "Well, but you have not been dipped. As you have not submitted to the divinely instituted ordinance of immersion, you have not obeyed the command of Christ. Therefore, though you may possess a degree of joy, yet I cannot pronounce it quite genuine. For I have the authority of my own minister to declare, that if you are dipped, your joy will be more strengthened, enlarged, heightened, brightened; and more truly fo too. And I have been fo fully convinced, from Mr. M.'s teaching, that immersion is effential to the truth as well as frength of divine joy, that I look upon mine to be now fealed and confirmed; but cannot think this of you or any other Pædobaptist."

To this declaration, founded on our author's legal doctrine, I can conceive the happy Poedobaptist making the following bold, yet humble, reply.—" As for dipping, I do not think it effential to the mode of baptizing; and fince I find Infant-Baptism not forbidden by any express prohibition, I rather think it virtually enjoined by the very filence of scripture, fince Infant-Circumcifion was an instituted mode of initiating into the church. the feed of Israel under the law; which facramental initiation is now loft, if Infant-Baptism be abolished. But I lay not the least stress on externals of this nature. In Christ Jesus, neither Infant-Baptism nor Adult-Immersion availeth any thing, but a new creature. The LORD has made me a partaker of the one effential baptism, and I am therefore perfectly eafy about any modes of washing away the filth of the flesh. I am a finner, justified from all things, freely by grace. My faith is fixed upon the rock of ages. My whole dependence is on the blood and righteousness of Christ. In him I fland completely justified, pardoned, accepted. My conscience echoes to the voice of his word, which fays, There is NO condemnation to them that are in Christ Fesus. Through him I have peace with God, and peace in my conscience: by him I am kept from falling: from him I derive all my blooming expectations of grace and glory: and in him him I have all those fresh and never-failing springs of light, life, confolation, liberty, strength, holiness, which refresh my spirit, and make the wilderness within to blossom as the rose, and florish as the garden of God. My joy is IN believing, and flows from the fountain of life and falvation in Christ Jesus. As for Mr. M.'s affertions respecting the virtue of dipping, it matters not what he or any other man fays, when scripture, experience, and facts, are contradicted. Nothing can enlarge or brighten my joy, but an enlargement and increase of faith. And the joy, which often refults from a legal reflexion on fome creaturework, is as different from that which fprings from a fimple dependence on the fulness of Christ, as the transient glimmering of a meteor is, from the vivid and genial irradiations of the fun. The one may give a flash of light, and gust of superficial comfort: but only the other can administer that joy in the Holy Ghost, which is unspeakable and full of glory. Multitudes of Pædobabtists are now partakers of this joy. Several of the excellent of the earth, who never were dipped, have lived and died confessors of the truth as in Fesus; while numbers of illustrious martyrs, who were strenuous advocates for Infant-Baptism, have had the joy of the Lord fo firengthened, enlarged, heightened, brightened, sealed and confirmed in the experience of their fouls, as to go chearfully to the stake; to clap their hands triumphant in the flames; and to rejoice, exulting, in the very jaws of death. With fuch as these may I be numbered here, and hereafter!" M (3) I

(3) I with that this prefumptive remonstrance could fuffice to answer, and expose, the poor legal infinuations of our author. But the enlargement of his mistakes necessitates me to enlarge in my strictures. Not content with representing the Eunuch's fubmission to baptism as the ground of " more truly strengthening" his joy, he finishes the whole, by making it "an effential part in the obedience of his faith." This is the highest step, in which Mr. M.'s erroneous gradation on this fubject generally terminates. Notwithstanding I have already, upon a former occasion, sufficiently exposed his false doctrine of the effentiality of dipping: though I have reason to believe, that some of his own brethren wish, he had not carried his affertions to fuch an unfcriptural length: and though he feems a little apprehensive himself, that neither reason nor scripture will warrant his ascribing the essence of obedient faith to his favorite ceremony: yet, as he once dropt the irrevocabile verbum, he feems, at all events, determined to abide by it. Only, here, he feems to foften the offenfive expression a little, by calling it an "effential part." But will this gentleman, who is fo very fond of distinctions and refinements, be so kind to inform us, of how many effential parts obedient faith confifteth; and under which of those effential divisions we are to rank dipping? Does he imagine, that the essence of faith will admit of being divided, fubdivided, and re-fubdivided, like the circumlocutory jumble of certain tedious harangues? We think dipping an absolute non-effential even in thofe, those, who think it their duty to submit to it; because the essence of obedient faith can and does subsist in thousands who never were dipt; and because many who have been immersed, were never partakers of the one essential baptism of the Spirit.

II. This part of the fubject naturally leads me to p. 116,-118, of your pamphlet, where you refume your doctrine of effentiality, and vent a great deal of abusive rage at the manner, in which I have exposed and refuted it. Indeed, this is our author's invariable method. When argument fails him, he flies to abuse; in which he feems to possess not a little fertility of invention. However, I have not fo great reason to complain, when I reslect, that he has treated with flill groffer illiberality, the whole body of the primitive Fathers; and attacked our established Church with all the effrontery of open invective, and with all the fcurrility of ironical fneer. For this piece of most confurmate indecency I shall referve a few animadversions, in their proper place.—But to return;

In p. 132, of my Letter to a Baptist-Minister, I have presented Mr. M. with five arguments, to prove that dipping is "not essential to the obedience of faith." These he never once touches. Indeed, why should he? since they were likely to burn his singers. I have also endeavored to throw some light into the Babel of his consused doctrine, by laying before him two apposite illustrations in p. 134, 135. These also he has thought proper to pass over, for reasons best known to himself. Thus, argument and illustration are as much lost upon this gentleman, as the most delicious and falutary food is, upon the depraved appetite of a fick man. Our author is fo full of himself, and so constantly affected with a supercilious nausea, that he rejects, with squeamish indifference, and haughty difdain, every illustrative and argumentative mode of stating truth; calling it fometimes "egregious nonsense," at other times, " magisterial bombast." This evasive and cavalier method of treating an author's arguments, is well exposed and reprobated by a great writer. usually happens, that this confidence does but betray men's ignorance, and shew, that many make that up in palsion, which they want in reason; zealoufly condemning what they little understand. And, I have observed it is the TRICK of some, that can fcarce give a reason for any controverted part of their creed."

But, let us fee how Mr. M. extricates himself from the force of my arguments, and from the embarrassment in which an invincible attachment to absurdity has involved him. I charge him, upon information, with faying that, "adult-dip-" ping is effential to the obedience of faith, though "not to falvation." This he denies in the following terms. "I did not express myself in fuch words, nor in words which had such a meaning." p. 116. No! Let us compare notes, and proceed to a fair examination. That you have repeatedly acknowledged the negative part of my charge (" dipping is not effential to fal-" vation") you will not deny. It is the affirmative part therefore that remains to be proved. You declare that you never did express in such words or in words carrying fuch a meaning, that "adult-"dipping is effential to the obedience of faith." I fay you did; and I prove it from the declarations of your own pen. P. 116, these are your very words: " I said that a submission to the " ordinance, was, in those, who were proper " fubjects of it, ESSENTIAL to the obedience of " their faith." Again, in p. 117, you fay, "It " is to all those, who are convinced of its being " a duty, ESSENTIAL to the obedience of their " faith." You repeat it a third time in p. 118. " A submission to it is ESSENTIAL."—Now that the reader may have a fair opportunity of judging between us, I shall in the following columns. compare Mr. Medley with himself.

Mr. M. negative.

"I did Not express myself in fuch words, nor in words which had such a meaning," viz. That adult-dipping is essential to the obedience of faith. p. 116.

Mr. M. affirmative.

" I said that a fubmission to the ordinance (of adult-dipping) was, in those, who were proper fubjects of it, ESSENTIAL to the obedience of their faith," p. 116 .-- " It is, to all those, who are convinced of its being a duty, ESSENTIAL to the obedience of their faith." Ibid .---"A fubmission to it is ESSENTI-AL." p. 118. -- " You are most heartily welcome, to publish it. from Dan to Beersheba, that I, Sam. Medley, do from my heart, think, believe, and fay, that believer's baptism, is ESSENTIAL to the obedidience of faith." Mr. M.'s private letter to the author.

The foregoing columns exhibit Mr. M. felf-compared, self-contrasted, and self-condemned. The column on the left fide introduces Mr. M. as denying that he faid "adult-dipping is effential to the obe-" dience of faith." Yet in the right the very identical denier, once, twice, thrice, four times affirms it. Which of these Messrs. Medley and Co. are we to credit? The negative, or the affirmative one? For my own part, I have a three-fold reafon to belive the latter; because in the mouth of three witnesses, viz. Mr. M. from the pulpit, Mr. M. from the press, and Mr. M. from his study, yet identically one, every word of my charge is eftablished. And I leave the reader to judge, whether the natural infcription on the above columns, ought not to be Logica Medleiensis!

But our author has devised a few loop-holes for himself. Let us see, whether in his attempts to flip through them, they do not close the tighter on the neck of his evative shifts. (1) P. 118, he fays, dipping is " effential to all those who are " convinced of its being a duty." Then, if the refirictive close of this fentence has any meaning, it must imply, that dipping is no duty to those who are NOT convinced it is. The Pædobaptiffs are much obliged to our candid effentialist for this concession. May we not hope for a still stronger one in some future publication? But, what a curious essential has Mr. M. contrived for us! fuch as varies its application and importance, according as the wind of conviction blows! So that, to those, who are convinced of it, as a duty, dipping is an effential; but to those who are not, it is a non-effential. Ah! Sir, this single concession, distinction, or call it what you please, as loudly proclaims the non-effentiality of dipping, as the self-contrasted columns do their author's glaring self-contradictions.

(2) Another explanatory shift, which our author gives us, is couched in the following words. "I said, it is effential to the obedience of saith, in "opposition to indifference in religion; and I say "fo still." p. 116. This is an infinuation, which, together with the exceptionable doctrine that ushers it in, I hope Mr. M. will, at some suture lucid interval, publicly retract. If a non-submission to dipping be a mark of "indifference in "religion," then, by a parity of reason, submission to it must characterize religious servor. And, if Mr. M. abides by his own principle, he must set dipping upon an equality with a moral precept; year with the general spirit of vital christianity. A principle this, which will bring after it a train of abfurd and dangerous inferences. For if " indifference in religion" is to be determined by a submission to dipping as a standing criterion; then, according to Mr. M.'s own principle, he ought to entertain a very indifferent idea of the religion of his Pædobaptist brethren, and to have a very exalted opinion of the piety of profelytes to his own perfuasion. A discrimination this, naturally refulting from his affertion; which too manifestly tends to inspire certain persons with a fond conceit of the height of their religion; tho? perhaps, it has, too often, nothing for its foundation, but a mere submission to an outward ceremony. 'Till therefore, Mr. M. can give us arguments to evince the indifference and lukewarmness, of those who are not proselyted to dipping, stronger than his inconclusive ipfe dixit, he will give us leave to look upon this and every fuch uncandid infinuation, as refuted by stubborn matter of fact.

† Dr. Stennett, in the preface to the first part of his Remarks on Mr. Addington's 'I'reatife, drops the following candid acknowledgement. " It is possible the zeal of Baptists may exceed. This is the case, when " an undue stress is laid upon baptism. Now, it is certain that they lay " an undue stress upon this facred rite, who maintain that it is neces-" fary to falvation, or place it in the fame point of view, with a noral " precept. But, if there are any Baptists who do this, I profess I do " not know them."----On this concession I beg leave to observe, that I Mr. M. feems indirectly to make dipping necessary to falvation, by maintaining it is effential to the obedience of faith; unless some person be so ingenious as to find out a distinction between what constitutes the essence of obedient faith, and what is necessary to salvation; which I confess is not my case. 2 That Mr. M. places dipping " in the same " point of view with a moral precept" is plain, from his oppofing a submission to this ceremony to "indifference in religion." So that, 3 I leave it to the Doctor's candor to determine, whether Mr. M's zeal has not "exceeded" here the bounds of truth; and, whether, if he never knew one of his brethren before, who laid an "undue firefs" on dipping, he does not know one now? tianity.

III. Our author, as if apprehensive, that his crude unscriptural affertions had involved him in inextricable absurdity, endeavors to prove myself, and the Church of England to be equally blended in the same unsortunate predicament; in order probably that with some company he may be kept in countenance a little. But his attempts here are as void of demonstration, as his manner is destitute of decorum. Thus he expresses himself.

"Were it so, that I had even infisted that baptism is effectial to falvation, I should have faid " no more, than the Mother of abominations has

" transmitted to her Daughter, and the to her Son, " the Vicar of St. Alkmond's; for your excellent

" Church (in her 9th Article) plainly infinuates,

" that baptism is effential to salvation, by making

"it (as well as faith) a pre-requisite to deliverance from condemnation." p. 117.

I am heartily concerned to fee fuch an extravagant fally of groundless abuse from Mr. M.'s pen; and can only account for it, upon a suppofition, that his mind was previously thrown into a violent perturbation; which feems to have been heightened, in proportion to the difficulty he found, in difengaging himfelf from the tramels :of a gross abfurdity. The truth is, our author feems to make a retreat from the force of argument, and he endeavors to do it with as good a grace as possible, lest his slight, should appear altogether inglorious: for, as he flies, like a true Parthian, he levels an arrow of retaliating cenfure at the Church of England; but, the misfortune is, instead of doing any execution, it recoils with a double reverberation on the fugitive marksman himself. (1) He quotes the 9th Article, to prove that our Church makes "baptim effential to falvation." The Article, to which Mr. M. refers, treats of original fin; the infection of which it supposes, in some degree to remain even in the regenerate; one of whose grand bleffings is described in the following words. "There is no condem-" nation for them that believe and are baptized." This is the passage, which he thinks so strongly favors N favors his doctrine of effentiality. But it is wide of the mark. Our Church adhering to the letter of fcripture, does not fay more, than our LORD does in Mark xvi. 16. "He that believeth and is baptized thall be faved." Indeed the Article does not fay fo much; for, whereas, a being delivered from condemnation, expresses only the negative, the term "fhall be saved," comprehends all the negative and positive parts of falvation. So that, if we argue from Mr. M.'s absurd premisses, it may be proved, that our LORD himself suspends the attaining everlasting salvation on a submission to baptism. Let us see then how Mr. M.'s reasoning will look, when reduced to a syllogistic form, and when applied to our LORD's words.

Mr. M.'s Logic Methodized.

I.

That church, which fays "there is no condemnation to them that believe and are baptized," makes baptifm effential to falvation:

But the Church of England in her 9th Article fays, &c.

---- Extended.

If the terms "there is no condemation" and "fhall be faved" are upon the whole, equivalent and convertible, then our LORD, as well as the Church of England, fays that baptism is essential to falvation:

But

But those terms are equivalent and convertible.

Therefore, according to Mr. M. our LORD makes baptism effential to salvation.

- Retorted and Refuted.

If it be abfurd and fallacious, to infer, that our LORD makes baptism effential to salvation, because he faith "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be faved;" then it is equally fo to draw a fimilar inference from the words of the Church of England in her oth Article:

But it is abfurd and fallacious to draw an inference in the former cafe:

Therefore it is equally abfurd and fallacious to draw a fimilar inference in the latter case, viz: to infer, that the 9th Article makes baptisin essential to falvation, because it afferts "there is no condemnation to them that believe and are baptized." q. e. d.—So that, although fome exceptionable modes of expression may occur in other parts of our Church-service, yet here, I am certain our author has no ground of complaint, unless he will dare to arraign the language of inspiration itself. And, when he infinuates, that the fcriptural expression I have desended, contains an error, "trans-" mitted from the Mother of abominations;" his infinuation throws a groundless reflexion on the established Church, and borders on indirect blasphemy. What! Sir, will you, upon cool deliberation, maintain that an expression tantamount to the declarations of Truth itself, is the offspring of the mother of erroneous abominations? Surely you will not. Therefore I wot that through ignorance and precipitancy, you shot this unguarded bolt.

(2) When you infinuate, that the Church of England is "a daughter of the mother of abominations," do you think, that either decency or truth will support the audacious infinuation? And, when you represent me as allied to the same abominable parent of errors, by only one intervening remove, do you not throw out fuch an oblique reflexion on the Gospel-Ministers of the Church of England, as they by no means deferve? According to your Logic, our Church is the daughter of Rome; because she is resormed from those errors, which once overspread the kingdom. So that, it seems, the light of a glorious Reformation has not cut off the relation between Reme and England: and altho' the penetrating rays of truth have discovered and dispelled the darkness of Popith error, yet the affinity between the mother of abominations and our reformed Establishment, still subsists. But, before you can demonstrate this relation, you should first propose a reconciliation between Christ and Belial, a coalition between truth and error, and a compatibility between light and darkness. 'Till you can reconcile these irreconcilable opposites, your obfervation as much fails in argument, as it teems with abuse.-According to your mode of stating coolefiastical genealogies, because I am a Minister of the Church of England, therefore I am a Grandson of the Mother of abominations. This refined compliment defigned for the Vicar of St. Alkmond's, neceffarily necessarily affects all and every of his evangelical brethren in the prefent day; and I refer it to their confideration, whether our Anabaptist can entertain any real regard for persons, whom he publicly stigmatizes as the offspring of the mother of harlots: and whether, the man, who has the face to characterize us by fuch an infamous stigma, is not equally an object of pity and contempt.—But our author's defamation does not stop here. genealogical afpersion involves all that ever were Ministers in our reformed Church; and confequently all those venerable names I have mentioned, in p. 121, of my Letter to a Baptist-Minister. So that, now, besides representing them and us as " BLIND in part" he has thrown an additional shade into our characters, by giving us the implicit title of "Grandsons of the Mother of abomina-" tions."

- Sic falsis FALSA remiscet!

As a Minister of the Church of England, and a subscriber to her doctrinal articles, I believe and preach that evangelical system, which was reprobated under the Marian persecution, but emerged from its temporary eclipse during the auspicious reign of the illustrious Elizabeth. I profess therefore to hold no other doctrines, but those of the reforming Deborah and of her reforming Bishops; doctrines, which in their very nature are diametrically opposite to Popery, and which constitute the very glory of Protestantism. But, notwithstanding this, I am still a Minister of the Church of England; and this is the crime, on account of which

which I am held forth to public view, as nearly, allied to the Mother of abominations.

If then, a man be a descendent of an antichristian Church, merely because he is the son of a national establishment, which sounds its reformation and departure from the errors of that Church on the truth of God; am I not kept in countenance by an illustrious train of venerable Resormers? And yet, must not they, and all that noble army of Martyrs, who bled to death for their invincible opposition to Popery, in the reign of Queen Mary, be one vast martyred family of the Mother of abominations? See then, whither Mr. M.'s reslection tends. By calling the Church of England the "daughter" of Rome, he stigmatizes our Reformers, Martyrs, Ministers, &c. as so many "grand-sons of the mother of abominations."

Hoping, that our author will, in some suture cool interval, retract such indecent aspersions; and wishing that he may learn to speak of our Church, in language a little more decent; I shall lay before him the declaration of one, who, tho neither a minister nor member of the Church of England, yet bore a respectful testimony to the truth of her doctrines and the purity of her worthip. The person I mean is Beza, whom Mr. Toplady distinguishes by the title of "illustrious" and whom he calls "Calvin's learned colleague and successor." As the declaration is very remarkable, in order that it may appear to the utmost advantage, I will transcribe Mr. Toplady's remarks.

remarks as well as the historical introduction of

" Toward the decline of Queen Elizabeth's reign" fays Mr. Toplady, " when opposition ran high against the outworks of the church; the opposers affected to give out, that their objections were authorized, and their measures countenanced, by the most learned foreign Protestants: and, especially, by BEZA. This being soon known at Geneva, that great man thought it his duty, to exculpate himself from a charge so ungenerous and unjust: which he took care to do, in a letter to Whitgift, then Archbithop of Canterbury. While the Archbishop" says Strype "was endeavoring to fuppress the male-contents against Episcopacy and the Church of England in its present establishment; he receiveth, March 8th, (1391,) a letter from Theodore Beza, the Chief Minister of Geneva, WHEREIN HE, by owning, with all respect, the Archbishop, and the rest of the English Bishops, and their government of this church, GAVE A NOTABLE CHECK to these new Reformers, who bore out themselves much with his (Beza's) authority. It feemed to have been written by him, in answer to one from the Archbishop, blaming him, for his (fupposed) meddling with the Church and State of England, without any lawful commission. In defence of himself, he (Beza) returned an answer; part whereof was, as followeth: That whereas his Lordship thought it meet, in his letters, to move them, (that is, to move the Geneva, Divines) to think well of this Kingdom, and of the CHURCH

CHURCH here, and the GOVERNMENT thereof; it troubled both him and SADEEL (another of the Ministers of Geneva) in some fort: as being greatly afraid, lest some sinister rumors were brought to him (the Archbishop) concerning them; or, left what they had written, concerning Church-government, (properly against the Antichristian tyranny of the Roman Church,) as necessity required, might be taken, by some, in that sense, as though they ever meant to compel, to their order, those Churches, that thought otherwise. - That such ARROGANCY was far from them: for, (added Beza) who gave us authority over any Church? And that they by no means thought, so SUBSTANTIAL MATTERS were kept, that there ought nothing to be granted to antiquity, nothing to custom, nothing to the circumstances of places, times, and persons." So wrote BEZA: or, to use Mr. Strype's own words on the occasion, "Thus did Beza and Sadeel, in the name of their Church, profess to the Archbithop, their RESPECT, HONOR, and APPROBATION of the Church of Eng-LAND." *

What a contrast is the venerable Beza to our Anabaptist! The former owns "with all respect" both the Ministers and Government of the Church of England: the latter treats both the one and the other, with all the disrespect, that petulance and ill-breeding can suggest.—The former, according to Strype, "professed his respect, honor, and approbation of the Church of England:" the latter, without the smallest ceremony, makes her of Popish extraction, and roundly flyles her the "daughter " of the Mother of abominations." -- The former thought it downright "arrogancy" to judge, meddle with, or condemn a national Church, in which " SUBSTANTIAL MATTERS" were preferved: but the latter, although he is conscious, that the substance of glorious Gospel-truth is retained in our Church, nevertheless abuses her, as if her whole fystem was nothing but wood, hay and stubble. And, what heightens the contrast between the learned and venerable Minister of Geneva and the Anabaptist of Liverpool, is, that the former bears fo honorable a testimony to the episcopal Church of England, though he himself was Member of a Church, whose government was Presbyterian. Mark the difference between the fenfible and pious effusions of candor, and the indignant overflowings of bigotry! What would Beza have thought of our Anabaptist, had he heard him flyle our Church the "Daughter of Rome," and her Ministers the offspring of that "Mother of abominations?" What! but that the defamation originated from the most ungrateful and wanton abuse of that religious liberty, which the defamer himself enjoys in a country, whose ecclesiastical establishment is interwoven with her civil constitution! *

O Thus

Our national church-establishment is so blended with the civil constitution of the realm, that any material injury done to the former, has always in some degree affected the latter; while the preservation of both, is like guarding the heart and lungs, those two principal parts in the animal economy. An awful instance in the former case this kingdom beheld, during its convulsed state in Gremwell's usurpation; an instance

Thus have I plainly analysed Mr. M.'s divinity on his favorite topic: and, I believe, to every person of discernment, the analysis has demonstrated, that the component parts, in the heterogeneous jumble, are bigotry, self-contradiction, legality, and absurdity. And thus have I also, with some pains, endeavored to remove the illiberal abuse with which his language is encrusted. In doing this, I have been obliged to hear a peal or two of harmless thunder, bursting from the angry cloud of our author's awakened sury against the Church of England and her sons. The reader will probably not be surprised at the noise of all this defa-

instance of the latter kind we now see in the defensive opposition made to the independent claims of revolting America. Without the fmallest pretentions to prophetic impulse, I may venture to affirm, that monarchy and episcopacy, will always stand or fall together in England. If ever therefore our ecclesiastical establishment should undergo a radical alteration, so will, in all probability, our civil constitution, too; and vice verfa. For, hitherto, every attempt made to abolish monarchy, hath aimed a consequent blow at the eradication of episcopacy: and this affords one reason, among many others, why myself, and the sons of our happy establishment in general, fo warmly disapprove of America's bold strides to a total independence. If Mr. M. therefore, will but calmly confider, that the King, who is the first of the three estates of Parliament, is also acknowledged Head of our national Church; that the episcopal Governors of our Church constitute a part of one branch of the legislature; that King, Lords and Commons, unite in supporting our ecclesiastical as well as civil establishment; and that Church and State are blended in one important coalition; he will not be furprifed that I charge him with "throwing out wanton witticifins" and wanton falfhoods too, against the higher powers, from whence his privileges, as a Dissenter, originate. For, if according to Mr. M. the Church of England be the daughter of Rome, then his Majesty must be the royal Patron of Antichristian error; the Bishops and subordinate Clergy are abettors of Popery; and the three estates of Parliament join in establishing the decrees of the mother of abominations. All this is naturally implied in your shameful infinuation: and, whether it does not come under the predicament of abusing the powers that be, and of speaking evil of dignitics, I leave it to your cooler reflexions to determine.

matory thunder, if he recollect the observation that introduced this chapter. Mr. M. is in the very bottom of the pit: and, two or three disappointed efforts to rise, have thrown him so effectually on his back, that there he lies, blustering, and bellowing at the Church of England and me.

IV. However, notwithstanding this abusive roar, I am willing to fland at the pit's mouth fill, and to offer a scheme for his deliverance. In short. Sir, I would advise you to give up your false doctrine of the effentiality of dipping. You have got into a labyrinth: and, by attempting to efcape through the same way that you first entered, you only get farther and farther into the intricate mazes of error. In order that you may facilitate your escape, I propose to you the following clue. You have afferted again and again, that adultdipping is essential to obedient saith: but, you do not confider, that what is the effence of any thing, constitutes its being or existence. Thus the essential difference between a man and a brute is, that the one reasons, but the other does not. If a person were to affert, that, because a man has a reason why he eats and drinks, that therefore eating and drinking are effential to his reasoning faculty; he would maintain an abfurdity, in much the fame flyle with yourself, when you affert, that because you have your own private reasons, for urging a fubmission to dipping, as a declarative obedience to the injunctions of Anabaptist communion; therefore dipping must be effential to the obedience of faith. But it is no more effential to it, than meats and drinks constitute the kingdom of God. The effence of obedient faith is a fubmission to the righte-ousness of God, and a uniform obedience to the moral precepts of his law.

This is the clue I propose to you, for your escape out of the labyrinth of legality. 'Till you are pleased to accept of it, you know what I have a toleration from yourself to publish to all the world, in a remarkable passage of your private letter.

"You are most heartily welcome, to publish it from Dan to Beersheba, that I, Samuel Medley, do from my heart, think, believe, and say, that believer's baptism is essential to the obedimence of faith!"

But, as I am not altogether without hopes, that you will, in some future period, fend forth your retractations; who knows but I may yet receive a commission from the author of the above declaration, empowering me to publish to all the world his fecond thoughts? viz. "That baptism is NOT " essential to obedient faith." 'Till that happy change takes place, do confider, Sir, what you have virtually authorized me to promulge. (1) That you aggrandize dipping into an ESSEN-TIAL: (2) That you make it the very being of obedient faith: (3) That you hereby confound essentials with non-essentials: (4) That you fully the glory of the gospel, by attributing that to an unimportant ceremony, which enters into the very nature of evangelical obedience: (5) That, like the judaizing teachers in Galatia, you legalize the the evangelical fystein: (6) That you are determined, wherever you go, to recommend this Galatian leaven: (7) That confequently you are refolved by a bigoted attachment to dipping, to disturb the peace, and embarrass the minds of the LORD's people: (8) That you mean hereby to be the bearer vivâ voce of your own absurdities: (9) That you have denied what you have acknowledged, and acknowledged what you have denied. by the most visible felf-contradiction of Mr. M. negative and Mr. M. affirmative: * (10) That you have afferted, what you cannot prove; and have attempted to prove, what has neither fcripture nor logic for its foundation: (11) That in your extraordinary efforts of this nature, you have difcovered the impotence of your arguments, in the very profusion of railery that clothes them: (12) That your manner of pressing the Church of England and me into your service, is a poor, evafive shift: and that the abominable epithets. you affix to both, favor more of impotent indignation, than of charity or truth.

This, Sir, is the round dozen of abfurdities and mistakes, wrapt up in the declaration, which you have tolerated me to publish: and I am heartily forry, for your own sake, that necessity is laid upon me to expose the inconsistent author.

V. But, now, even admitting, that you maintain baptism is not essential to salvation; how does your constant practice correspond with this received principle? If you do not think submission to dipping, a part, or condition of falvation; why do you press it with fuch earnestness on those, who are already complete in Christ, through believing? It is a generally-established maxim throughout your churches, to prohibit your members from all communion with those that do not make dipping effential to the ordinance of baptism: and, it is notorious, that persons, for no other crime, fave that of communicating with other christian churches, have been expelled from your communion. Instances of this nature are not infrequent. Now the Apostle saith, We are all the children of God by FAITH in Christ Fesus. Gal. iii. 26. You will not deny, but thousands of fuch believing children are to be met with among Padobaptists: you will also admit, that they are, by faith, united to their living Head: that they are, by virtue of fuch union, real members of his mystical body: that they are, in confequence of this myslic fellowship, cemented together in a spiritual communion, as the feveral members of the body are united to the head and to each other, in an harmonious connexion and fubordination: that they are " by ONE SPIRIT (and not by one particular mode of dispensing an ordinance) baptized into ONE body:" I Cor. xii. 13. And that they are invested, through their living Head, with all the bleffings of the new and everlafting covenant.-Now if you grant this, (and deny it you cannot, without flying in the face of revealed truth;) upon what principle, do you exclude from externals, those, who are joint-partakers with you of the effentials of true christianity? If you do not look upon dipping as an effential part of falvation; why do you publicly difavow all church-communion with those, who are "the body of Christ" as well as you "and members in particular?" 1 Cor. xii. 27. If living faith in the Son of God, and unfeigned love to the brethren, be the two effential bonds in the communion of faints; why doyou virtually break these facred ties, and spoil the harmony of this divine fellowship, by expelling from your communion, those, who differ from you on a point of allowed unimportance? Is it cold water or the living baptism of the Spirit, that conflitutes the bond of your communion? If the former; then who would envy a church fuch a frigid cement? If the latter; why reject your brethren, who share in the blessings of that essential fellowship?

VI. The reader will not be furprised, that I put these serious interrogatories to our Anabaptist, when I lay before him the said Anabaptist's explicit declarations, in p. 46, of his pamphlet. These are his words: "We must declare, that we do "not look upon them" (all the christian churches of Pædobaptists in the world) "as churches "constituted, with all that regularity, which God has ordained; which will best consist with the beauty of gospel-worship; which will distinguish the church from the world; and redound most to the edification of the body of Christ."

fuperior dignity above all its rivals; and to make Anabaptism the glory of the whole earth. To the above curious paragraph, I must naturally join his and Dr. Gill's PROPHECY. "I firmly believe " with Dr. G. that, when the church of Christ is " purged from her remaining drofs, these corrup-" tions will also be done away; and that the time " will come, when infant-sprinkling will be no more " practifed in the world." Whether this remarkable prophecy was uttered by the Doctor, tanquam ex tripode, upon the commencement of, what his echo is pleased to call "an insight into baptism;" or whether it was cygnea cantio, the fwan-fong, that closed his prognostications and his life; I fancy, it is not very material to inquire. As the Doctor has not fixed the precise period, wherein his prophecy will be accomplished; and as his echo hath thrown no additional light, upon this circumstance; we are left at an absolute uncertainty, as to the time when, the manner how, and the persons, by whom, this important event is to take place. For my own part, I think, that Anabaptism stood the fairest chance of being the Establishment, under the friendly auspices of the Usurper, when dipping was even made the high-road to military preferment: and that, fince it lost the day then, by the happy re-establishment of monarchy and episcopacy, it will never be likely to arife at the fummit of its expected glory, unless a more glorious reign of the Rump should be restored; unless another set of enthusiastic regicides be raised up, to fcour the land; and unless another prophetic phanomenon like Thomas Muncer, or another redoubtable monarch, like John of Leyden, in rebellious coalition, should go forth, to restore the anarchy and confusion of the famous German Æra, in 1525; and unless Anabaptism should be more successful in its projects, than it has hitherto been, under the fostering influence of British or German usurpation. Unless such national convulsions as these thould be revived, and the standard of rebellious bigotry; should attract more numerous adherents. I think Anabaptism stands but a poor chance; and that Infant-baptism will not meet with so universal an abolition, as might be wished. If, therefore, after two fuch prophets as Dr. G. and Mr. M. I may be permitted to offer my opinion; I really believe the prediction of this prophetic Duumvirate will be accomplished, -ad Gracas calendas. But, when that will be, I leave to the chronological disquisitions of the surviving prophet to find out. -But, I will venture to prophefy myself, viz. that, when the church of Christ is purged from her remaining drofs of party-spirit; instead of furious debates about comparative trifles, the general contention will respect the faith, once delivered to the faints: instead of quarrelling about modes and forms, which are but the shadow, we shall be eagerly in the pursuit after truth and righteousness, which are the substance of christianity: that the manifold breaches, occasioned by the separating hand of schism, will be healed thro' the mediation of brotherly-kindness; that bigotry shall stop her mouth, being struck mute by the more more melodious voice of pacific love: that the ruder blasts of party-zeal, which agitate the trees. in the garden of God, shall die away into the gentle breezes of tenderness, charity and moderation; that professors will no more separate from each other, because of those trivial differences. that at present distract the church: that Anabaptifts will drop their intemperate zeal for dipping: that the bond of church-communion will be no longer made to confift in a particular mode of washing away the filth of the flesh: and that Mr. M. himfelf, were he to live in those halcyondays of the church, would fuspend his warmth for cold water, and exhaust all his zeal in pressing the "one baptism;" that he would then cease to be the narrow-minded devotee of bigotry, and commence the generous patron of unbounded catholicism.

'Till this happy state of things arrives, let us examine our author's sentiments respecting the present situation of the church; of which he exhibits a bigoted and partial representation. As no compliments, poured on his own party, are too high: so no style can be too depreciating, when he speaks of his differing brethren. He is always in the unfortunate extreme of sulfome panegyric or degrading investive. Having smiled at the joint prognostication of the two Anabaptists, respecting the suture glory and universal establishment of Anabaptism, let us analyse our author's opinion concerning the resormed churches that practise Insant-baptism. Of these he declares, that "he does not look upon them as churches " conflituted with all that regularity which God " has ordained." It is of no fort of confequence in what light he looks upon them, fince it is manifest, his eye is jaundiced by bigotry; a disorder this, that prevents him, as well from discovering the defects of his own, as from observing the excellencies of another party. And as to the irregularity he implicitly charges on all religious communities, but his own; I can only fay, I wish our author would look at home. For, if frequent divisions, religious animolities, strifes, contentions, be any proof of ecclefiaftical irregularity, I know not a professing body of people, whom the charge fo justly fuits: and, if I were even to make this an argumentum ad hominem, I fancy I should not be very wide of my mark.

But, let us examine, wherein the boasted regularity which is the glory of Anabaptism, consistent.

(1) It is such as "best consists with the beauty of "gospel-worship." As I had always conceived not the most favorable idea of Anabaptism, I acknowledge I feel the less disposed to admit this representation of its beauty: Nor can the eulogium of our panegyrist eradicate my preposessions on this head. I acknowledge, that the publication of pure evangelical truth, constitutes the essential beauty of gospel-worship; and that a variation in external modes can never destroy this essential, as long as the truth is preached and received: so that thus far, we are not reluctant in admitting the claims of some Anabaptists to the beauty of gospel-worship. But, I ask, what becomes of this "beauty," when a congregation of Anabaptists are curfed with a false prophet? when the errors of the minister are transfused through the whole fervice? and when the unfortunate flock hear not the truth either in the fermon, the prayer, or the hymn? That this is the case in feveral instances, you will acknowledge. What becomes then of the "beauty" of gospel-worship? Is it preserved because the man preaches, prays, or fometimes dips? If you think it is; then you make the effence of evangelical beauty to confift merely in preaching, praying, dipping, &c. So that, according to fuch an abfurd notion, the most hideous deformity of damnable herefy and the beauty of gospel-worship, may subfist together in one and the fame congregation. But if you deny this confequence, as well as the premisses, from whence it is deduced; then you must grant, that if the truth be not preached, the effential beauty of gospelworship is effaced; the glory of the LORD is departed; and that Ichabod should be written upon the door of the meeting. And if you grant me this, then I will eafily demonstrate, that the Church, of which I have the honor to be a Minister, possesses a fuperior advantage, above you and all the Anabaptists in the world. For wherever the fervice of the Church of England is performed, although the pulpit and reading-desk often clash prodigioufly; yet the congregation are fure always to hear the truth as in Jesus notwithstanding; first, in the scriptures of the old and new Testament, the reading reading of which is never omitted in our churchfervice; and fecondly, in the found liturgy, evangelical creeds, and fcriptural collects, which run through our public worship like a woof of gold, or guard it, against error, as a systematic barrier. Whereas, when a congregation are left folely to the difcretionary effusions of the preacher himfelf; how often are they put off with a rotten fermon, a rotten prayer, and a rotten hymn too? So that perhaps they are difmiffed without hearing the fmallest portion of truth, fave in the fingle fentence that composes the text; which, in the hand of error, is fo perverted, and adulterated, as to look no longer like itself. But this can never be altogether the fate of members of the established church. Though error, for about twenty minutes, be published from the pulpit, yet the reading-desk, for a full hour, is guarding the hearers against the short-lived declamation: and we hope there are multitudes, who are judicious enough to difcern the glaring contrast, and reap advantage from our church-fervice, though they may go away filled with disappointment and chagrin at the heterodox fermon.—So much for "the beauty of gospel-worship." Proceed we now to confider the second particular in our author's boasted church-regularity.

(2) He afferts, that the religious focieties of Poedobaptists are not constituted, with that regularity "which will (N. B.) distinguish the church from the world!" Here our author, is so blinded by his rapid driving in the old cause, that he can discover discover no other object but Anabaptism, arrayed in all the beauty and glory of the earthly Ferusa-The Anabaptists are "the church;" they monopolize church-regularity; and fuch is the ecclefiaffical irregularity of Poedobaptiffs, that they deferve no higher title than that of "the world;" and the world, you know, "lieth in the wicked one." As I have no hope, that our Anabaptist -Fervidus, will view his brethren through the medium of candor, 'till he abate fomewhat of the velocity of his furious driving; I therefore leave him peaceably to enjoy the dream of his distinguishing imagination. I beg only, that the reader would carefully finell this little sprig of Medleian divinity; and judge, whether, instead of the odors of charity, it does not emit the bitter effluvia of the wormwood of schism. Sorry should I be, if the reader carried the bitter sprig in his bosom. Therefore I advise him, after he has discovered its nature by its scent, to drop it instantaneously, and to regale his fenses with the reviving fragrance of the Rose of Sharon. This will prove an effectual antidote against every pestilential vapor, that exhales from the fungus of bigotry; and fave too, from those noxious damps, arising from cold water, which chill the constitutional warmth of the healthy and the strong.

(3) The third and last puff is, that the regularity aforesaid will "redound most to the edification of the body of Christ." This is the finishing stroke to that pomposity of language which distinguishes all our author's commendations of his favorite favorite mode. How dipping can contribute to the edification of the body of Christ, I must own, I am not able to find out : nor indeed can I perceive the smallest connexion between dipping and edifying; except in the jingling termination of the words. The whole of our author's lucubration upon this subject resembles "a fun-beam and cloud connected with bands of finoke." If the reader chuse to see, how widely his fentiments differ from those of scripture, I beg he would confult Col. ii. 12; being fully perfuaded, that the issue of this scrutiny will terminate in a full conviction, that the effentiality of dipping contributes to the edification of the body of Christ just as much as Mr. M.'s thoughts on the fubject are allied to truth and fenfe.

From the preceding observations, I am naturally led to propose the following queries.

(1) Is it not the great design of the Head of the church, that "there should be no schiss in the body?" and do not the influences of the Spirit and the work of the ministry co-operate to this great and important end?

(2) Are not the reception of evangelical truth and the exercise of brotherly love the two essential bonds of communion, by which all the members of Christ are joined together in the same body?

(3) As these bonds of communion derive their effence, exertion, and continuance, from the Spirit of Christ, by whose divine agency the whole body of the church is animated and enlivened;

livened; are not therefore all the children of God, of every denomination under Heaven, sharers in this general fellowship?

(4) Do not the different degrees of honor and usefulness, which the members respectively possess in the human body, and the union substituting between them, illustrate that diversity of official honor between particular members of Christ's mystical body, and the harmonious connexion, by which they are blended together in one?

(5) Is this communion any more destroyed by the various differences in non-essentials among christian denominations, than the union in the human body, is interrupted by the different size, position, or clothing of its feveral members?

(6) When the LORD's people agree in effential truth; is it not contrary to scripture, and repugnant-to common sense, that brethren should wrangle, and unchurch one-another, about such trisling causes of contention, as, whether we should be dipt or sprinkled with water in baptism; whether we should receive the LORD's supper, standing or kneeling; or whether we ought to pray with a form, or without one?

(7) Since the innumerable infirmities, connected with man's present state of impersection, render it impossible that there should be a persect and universal agreement in matters of doubtful disputation; do not those, who separate from, and judge their differing brethren, by that very act of separation, lay a virtual claim to infallibility?

(8) Since neither an agreement in externals will fave, nor a difference in them, destroy a man; should not professors of every denomination refolve to think and let think, on those disputable non-effectials?

(9) Where professors differ about the externals of an ordinance, or the particular mode of dispensing it; should this be any reasonable bar to Christian communion?

- (10) If God himself vouchsafe to admit his people to fellowship with him, notwithstanding their numerous failings and imperfections; ought not professors to imitate his gracious condescension? And, should not those, who will sit down together at the marriage-supper of the Lamb, unite upon earth, in a facramental prelibation of that eternal feast of love?
- important affair, as to renounce communion with those, who do not think it essential in the administration of baptism; do they not hereby visibly disown the excellent of the earth, and reject those whom Christ hath received?
- (12) When fuch a comparative trifle can make men fiand aloof from their brethren; are the principles, which support such conduct, likely to promote the glory of God, or the peace of the church?
- (13) Since therefore Anabaptism manifestly tends to nurture divisions; to interrupt the harmony of God's united people; to unchurch every Pædobaptist community of Christians upon earth; and to destroy destroy that fellowship, which subsists between the members of Christ's mystical body: is it any breach of truth, or deviation from charity, to pronounce Anabaptism a main pillar of bigotry?

(14) Do not Anabaptists, who separate from, and unchurch their brethren, for that, which is neither in whole nor in part necessary to salvation; give a sad proof, that they are so far actuated by the narrow spirit of a party, and not by the generous motives of candor and brotherly love?

(15) Although, by those plausible infinuations and low artifices, peculiar to a party-spirit, they may gain over proselytes to dipping; is it probable, that a proselytism founded on such a watery basis, will promote the glory of God, or contribute to the spiritual welfare of the inveigled proselytes themselves? I trow not.

(16) Is it to be wondered, that the very fame spirit of schism which urges a separation from all other Christians upon earth, should operate strongly among the Anabaptists themselves; and lay the soundation of those intestine divisions, for which they, as a people, are most remarkable?

(17) While therefore they lay claim to a superior degree of purity, both in doctrine and discipline, above all their brethren; how comes it to pass, that they agree so little among themselves? Have they not reason to suspect, that the bigotry, which they exercise towards others, lies deeply at the bottom of those jealousies, which distract and divide some of their own congregations? Does not this leaven need to be purged out from among them?

(18) Have

- (18) Have Anabaptists a scriptural right, any more to confine their members, than to monopolize "the church:" Are not the children of God, in more senses than one, freemen of Christ Jesus, and members of his church at large? Are they not at liberty to attend the ordinances, wherever they think proper? And have bigoted disciplinarians any right to bind them with a cord of church-authority, to this or the other congregation? Does not such uncatholic discipline come under the predicament of lording it over the consciences of God's people; and of exercising dominion over their faith?
- (19) Though, by difingenuous means justly detestable by every generous mind, the Anabaptists may increase the number of their proselytes; yet is this any proof that their church is the more truly florishing? Rather, as their sentiments are big with legality, and a contempt of their brethren; is it not to be feared, that such as imbibe them are under the power of that bitter zeal, which, like a gangrene, eats into the very vitals of living Christianity? And that, if some of the warm advocates for Anabaptism, were divested of their attachment to cold water, they would be stript of their great all?
- (20) Since Mr. M. has now aggrandized dipping so highly, as to make it "ESSENTIAL to the obedience of faith;" should he not either inform us, whether the rest of his brethren are of the same mind? or else, upon a declaration of their dissent, and a conviction of his error, should he not adopt the mortifying alternative of publishing his recantation of the exceptionable expression, and of the salse doctrine couched under it? He cannot reasonably object to this proposal, since, in the attested challenge, he has himself proclaimed his readiness to recant; and that publicly too, whenever his errors should appear to him, re-

(21) But if our author, through the predominancy of ignorance, prejudice and legality, should still persevere in maintaining the essentiality of dipping; ought not his brethren, to rescue Anabaptism from the just censure, it has incurred through his blundering pen? and to ENTER A PROTEST against his legal sentiments? But if Mr. M. cannot be prevailed upon palinodiam canere; and if his brethren coincide with him in his novel tenets: is it not high time for the ministers of Christ to cry aloud to professors, in the cautionary language of St. Paul. "Beware of (catabaptism) The concision?" Phil. iii. 2.

Some strictures on Dr. Stennett's consining the idea of dipping to the word baptize.—His virtual charge of our "departing from the authority of Christ, and "opening the door to a thousand innovations, of "dangerous consequence," retorted and refuted.—Mr. M.'s mode of RIDICULING HIS BRETHREN, exposed; and his attempts to evade the force of my former strictures on that head, proved to be destitute of truth and fair representation.—Some preliminaries stated, respecting the Mode of baptism.

A S my address to Mr. M. upon a former occasion, was intended principally to confider the subjects of bap:ifin; I therefore spent the less time in vindicating the mode of that institu-Having never feen any formal treatife, upon this inferior part of the controversy, either pro or con; my observations were the concise and natural refult of fcripture-inquiry. Since my late publication, however, I have had an opportunity of reviewing the fentiments of other Pædobaptists; as well as of examining the opinions of some of the most renowned advocates for the essentiality of dipping: and, upon an impartial examination of the arguments on both fides of the question, I am more confirmed, than ever, in my former fentiments. I have carefully perused the recent controversy between the Rev. Mr. Addington and Dr. Stennett: and, I must say, that however I may respect the latter of these two gentlemen, as a person person of piety and learning; yet, his arguments, particularly in favor of immersion, appear to savormore of the plausibility of smooth address, than of the solidity of conclusive reasoning; and, when he is pleased to style our mode of administering the ordinance by sprinkling or pouring of water, a "supposititious kind of baptism, *" we think the Doctor's infinuation equally destitute of candor and truth.

I. If Anabaptists were content with maintaining their particular mode, only as the favorite badge of their party, without infifting on it as the essence of the facrament; our controversy would be inflantaneously at an end. But, when Dr. S. echoing the fentiments of his brethren, does not foruple to affirm, that the word baptize, "properly and " only fignifies dipping; " and that " it is impossible " for any one, to give it a different meaning; ‡" we are of opinion, that fuch fentiments have a direct tendency to support the interests of that bigotry, which is too predominant amongst Anabaptists already; and which, instead of receiving an additional spur from the Doctor's pen, stands manifestly in need of a restraining curb. Without flaying to confider how far these infinuations compliment the abilities of Pædobaptists, who, in criticism, as well as divinity, are not a whit behind the chiefest of Anabaptists; I cannot help taking notice, that, if according to the Doctor, "it be " impossible" to give the word baptize, any other meaning but that of "dipping," then undoubtedly myself and others have undertaken a very arduous task; for, is it not more than Herculean labor, to encounter an impossibility? or to attempt the proof of a point, which, it is infinuated, has nothing to authenticate or recommend it, but " corrupt practice?" However, notwithstanding the Doctor's bold affertions, and the formidable appearance, which 146 close pages, exhausted in vindication of dipping, may carry in the eye of an inconfiderate reader; I will, for once, adventure a bold affertion, in the Doctor's categorical flyle; and fay, that the word baptize does not fignify dipping only, and that it is not impossible to prove, it has a different fignification. Yea, and I will even venture, not only to affert, but to demonfrate this; if scripture-authority; the criticisms of lexicographers; the opinion of eminent divines; the concessions of even some Anabaptists; the sentiments of primitive fathers and eminent reformers; and the usage of Protestant churches, can be supposed to furnish any solid materials for such undertaken demonstration.

II. In the apology, which Dr. S. makes for his invincible attachment to the peculiarities of his party, one would almost infer, from the solemnity of his style, that he thought these peculiarities were of the highest importance. These are his words, "I know not how we can depart from it" (dipping,) "without affronting the authority of "Christ, and opening the door to a thousand in-"novations of very dangerous consequence." *

How

How the relinquishing an unimportant mode should be productive of "innovations,"-" thou-" fands" of innovations,—and of "very dangerous " consequence," I must acknowledge, I am not ingenious enough to find out. I can very eafily conceive how an intemperate zeal for dipping, and a rigid determination to support the cause of Anabaptism, may open a door to dangerous innovations; because, of this, history affords an evident proof. Whence fprung the troubles in Germany, in the beginning of the fixteenth century? What was the origin of those dangerous "innovations" both of a civil and religious nature. which fpread terror and depopulation through a great part of the continent, and disturbed Luther and his pious affociates in the work of reformation? Did they not originate from Anabaptism? Was it not a fiery zeal for a particular mode, that induced Bernard Rotman, the mad declaimer, John of Leyden, the infatuated monarch, Muncer, Knipperdoling, and all the other ringleaders of a deluded feet; to adopt this wild position, viz. "that " all who were not RE-BAPTIZED were to be account-"ed PAGANS and INFIDELS?" and to extend it ftill farther, by publicly declaring, that all fuch " were to be KILLED?" * Who fees not, that it was through the "door" of a rigid attachment to Anabaptism, that a formidable train of these most dreadful innovations entered? And who sees not also, from these stubborn facts, that bigotry in non-effentials is the natural parent of innovations. When the breast is enflamed by an inordinate zeal for the distinguishing badge of a party, the inflammation often increases to fuch a degree, as to precipitate the unhappy zealot into the most violent measures. Zeal in such a case, operates on the inflammable conflitutions of bigots, as the paroxysm of a malignant sever, does, upon the body. The human mind is wrought up to a pitch of frantic delirium, in the one case, as well as the other: and, it is not therefore, to be wondered, that bigots, during the paroxyim of their fiery zeal, should discover symptoms of madness, refembling those, which attack persons in a burning fever, and prompt them to commit fuch defperate acts, the very idea of which in the coolness of a healthy conflitution, would firike them with horror. This feems to have been literally the case of the German Anabaptists. A high sever for re-baptizing, drove them to the most uncharitable fentiments, respecting such as differed from them; whom they called Pagans and Infidels. Here the paroxyfm commenced. This uncharitableness proceeded from words to deeds. Their party must be supported vi & armis. What they could not effect by argument, they are determined to accomplish by the sword. Furor arma ministrat. The firong delufion fuggeffed the necessity of establishing a spiritual regency; and a bloody flag ought to have been the proper enfign of these fanguinary faints. Dreams and visions were the revelation, by which they pretended to have a commission from R God,

God, appointing John of Leyden, the Dutch Taylor, "to the government of the whole world," and declaring "that with mighty forces, he was to go out and destroy all kings and princes whatever; to the end that the godly alone may reign and, "rule in the world."

From hence we may eafily perceive, how frequent is the transition from one species of fiery zeal to another; and with how ill a grace, any cautions respecting innovations come from the. mouth or pen of Anabaptists. Although I verily. believe, that there fubfifts a great contrast between the political and religious fentiments of the German and British Anabaptists; yet methinks, a retrospect to those scenes of blood, which originated from an unhallowed zeal for Anabaptism, ought to make its modern advocates a little more cautious in pressing their peculiarities with such warmth, as to unchurch all the world but themselves; and to represent their brethren in no better a state, as to facramental communion, than unbaptized Pagans. We think too, that when Dr. S. represents "a de-" parture from dipping, as affronting the authority " of Christ," he throws out an impotent censure against us, which is telum imbelle fine ictu, a feeble weapon, that does no execution. We can affure this gentleman, that we are as jealous for "the au-" thority of Christ," as himself, or any Anabaptist upon earth; nor would we, in the smallest punctilio, wish to deviate from any express institution of our common Legislator. But, we cannot think that the Doctor's implicit charge of "affronting" the divine authority, has any thing really to do with our administering the ordinance of baptism in another mode, different from that of dipping. Could the Doctor, or any of his brethren, prove, that the rite can be administered with fignisicant refemblance only by immersion; and that the words baptize and baptism can be accommodated to no other idea, but that of dipping: in that case, we should suspect the validity of our mode of administration by sprinkling or pouring of water. But we defy the Doctor to do this: and, under a full persuasion, that neither he, nor his subaltern of Liverpool, who sights with his borrowed weapons, have hitherto done it, I shall proceed to a consideration of their respective arguments.

III. Before I do this, I cannot avoid taking notice of a fulfome encomium, Mr. M. passes on Dr. Stennett's answer to Mr. Addington, in a note, p. 16. "One would have hoped," fays he, "that "that excellent performance, had filenced the " advocates for sprinkling, for a while at least; " especially as Mr. A. has not thought proper to " reply to the Doctor."—Why Mr. A. has not thought proper to do this, I cannot possibly determine. This however, I will venture to affert, that he is not filent, because not able to encounter the Doctor. For there is nothing fo really tremendous in the Doctor's treatifes, as to intimidate any judicious Pædobaptist from considering them fully; much less one of Mr. A.'s professional knowledge, as a scholar and a divine. If Mr. A.'s other more important avocations did not abridge his leifure moments, we might, probably, be favored with fuch a reply, as would be more than a match for the Doctor's "excellent performance." But, perhaps indeed, Mr. A. is filent, from a full perfuasion that it is not operæ pretium to maintain a controverfy with men, who feem to admit it as the declarative maxim of their party, that, whether they have the best of the argument or not, they will have the last word .- Mr. A.'s silence, at the fame time that it furnishes Mr. M. with an implicit but groundless argument of inability, seems to fill him with a proportionable degree of aftonishment, that I thould presume to offer any strictures on a fubject, which he thinks his oracle has difcuffed with unanswerable argument already; and he adopts a supposition, " that I have only read one "fide of the question;" otherwise I should not have advanced, what others have contradicted. But here he happens to be altogether mistaken. For, antecedently to my late publication, I neither faw nor read either fide of the question: and I hope the fequel will demonstrate, that I have attended to Mr. M.'s maxim, which, from the prodigious depth of his learning, he has been fo kind to construe for me, viz. " Audi alteram partem, that is, " hear the other fide." -- As to the "mortification," which he infinuates must arise to me, from a perusal of the Doctor's "excellent performance;" I affure him he is here likewife mistaken. Instead of being mortified, I am amused. And my amusement is not a little heightened by Mr. M.'s affuming the "office of exhibiting me." If indeed the exhibiter had either truth, modefly, or learning, wherewith to grace his exhibitions, he might palm them upon the public, as res splendidas. But, laboring, as they manifestly do, under every species of disadvantage, they exhibit a jumble of consummate ignorance and audacity; and, like the prophet's marred girdle, are good for nothing, but to be histed off the stage of controversy, with a Pro-

IV. In my animadversions on the inconclusiveness of Mr. M.'s pulpit-declamations, I took notice of his faying, that those, who administer baptism by pouring or sprinkling of water, "only " baptize the ends of their fingers." This observation I faid 'favored more of vulgarity than of folidity;' and I now reiterate the charge. In order to apologize for the obnoxious phrase, Mr. M. informs us, that it was borrowed from Mr. Selden. But furely the mere ipse dixit, or precipitate " thought" of this gentleman, furnishes no argument against our mode; nor does the name of Mr. S. or Mr. any-body-elfe, give fuch a fanction to an unguarded expression, as that it should drop its exceptionable import, merely because a great man espouses it. A vulgarity is a vulgarity still, whether it proceed from the pen of Mr. Selden. or from his borrower Mr. M. And a vulgar expression, so far from being weakened, is rather additionally offensive, in proportion to the greatness of the name that dignifies it. Thus a vulgar expression from Parmenas, is not so vulgar as from Mr.

Mr. M. because he (Mr. M.) is a much greater man. However, though Mr. Selden might be excufed in dropping a vulgar thought in his fludy, end even in publishing it afterwards from the prefs; yet, furely this will by no means juffify his borrower in throwing out the wanton witticifm from the pulpit. When the facred desk is difgraced by fuch declamatory petulance; is not the folemnity of a public ordinance destroyed? Does not the declaimer bid farewell to the dictates of decency and candor? And does not fuch an illiberal mode of attacking us, imply, that our modest opponent meant, either to laugh his hearers out of their veneration for Pædobaptist, or to dragoon them into a compliance with his inconclusive dogmas? Is fuch pompous felf-fufficiency a likely way, to engage an audience in favor of the preacher or his sentiments? Would not a sensible man avoid this hackneyed species of vulgarizing to a promifcuous audience? when he confiders, that fome present might be sharp-fighted enough, to fee that fuch witty declamation was a poor substitute for argument; and indicated the weakness of the cause he intended to support.

Whether I had not reason to charge Mr. M. with publicly ridiculing his brethren, who do not practise immersion, let the adopted quotation from Selden testify. Yet this gentleman has the face to think himself prodigiously injured and even flandered; and attempts to exculpate himself. "As to your charge of ridiculing my brethren, I do so lemnly declare, that I am falsy accused. Is it of not cruel to be thus publicly vilified and flan-" dered?" * How a man can thus fix a folema declaration to a notorious mistake sculking under a prevaricating quibble, is to me affonithing. What! is it not "ridicule" to represent us before a public auditory, as " only baptizers of the ends of "our fingers?" confequently to exhibit us as difpenfing a mock-ordinance; yea, no ordinance at all? Does not that justly merit the name of "ridicule" which ungenerously sneers at our ministerial capacity? When we pour or fprinkle water on the fubject in the name of the bleffed Trinity, we think that the facred ceremony is, to all intents, performed. Yet Mr. M. publicly declares, we baptize only the ends of our fingers. Does he not by fuch a shameless infinuation, render the ministers who differ from him, and their mode of administration, at once contemptible? And, by doing this on a folemn public occasion, is not his conduct marked with a fingular aggravation? Will he evade the force of our just reprehension by urging, that he ridiculed none of his ministerial brethren, because he mentioned none of their names? Or does he think it any extenuation of his misdemeanor, that his ridicule was borrowed? Did he not by a public quotation, fet his approbatory feal to it, and thereby make it his own? All these circumstances considered, I submit the matter to the decision of any impartial umpire, whether the charge of ridiculing his brethren, is not justly and firmly fixt upon Mr. M. Whether, when he "folemnly declares that he is falfly accused," he does * Page 37.

does not dignify an obvious untruth, with a follemn declaration: and, whether he ought not in the most express and humiliating terms, ask pardon of his Pædobaptist brethren, for the contemptuous ridicule he has repeatedly poured on their folemn ministrations; and of God, for solemnly declaring, what is not true.

He attempts, indeed, to keep his ridicule and himself in countenance a little, by alledging, "that no one ridicules practices, they! suppose " abfurd, more than I do." But here his reprefentation of me is as void of just coloring, as his borrowed fneer at his brethren has been proved to be deflitute of candor, decency, and truth. By "practices, which I suppose absurd," he means dipping, &c. But I am not conscious of "ridiculing" this practice, as a mode of baptizing. I only expose, perhaps sometimes with a little "mild irony," the abfurdity of laying fuch an unscriptural stress on immersion, as to make it effential to the obedience of faith. Papists pervert the intent of baptism, when they maintain that, the ordinance confers grace ex opere operato. This abfurd perverfion of a divine institution we expose, and detest. But, because we think the abuse of an ordinance an object of just ridicule, we do not therefore ridicule the ordinance itself. Anabaptists maintain, that dipping head-over-ears is effential to baptism; and that the administration of the ordinance by pouring or fprinkling of water is no baptism. We fmile therefore at an abuse of their practice to the purposes of bigotry, though we acknowledge knowledge the practice itself to be a mode of baptizing. If any fet of people were to adopt it as a peculiarity, that, in order to a due celebration of the LORD's fupper, and the only proper reprefentation of the fulness of Christ, each communicant should eat a loaf of bread; if they thus restricted the effence of the facrament to their mode, and afferted, that those who dispensed the elements in smaller quantities, did thereby destroy the nature of the ordinance, and make it no eucharist; would not their peculiarity be an object of just ridicule? We think the bigoted firefs, which Anabaptists place in the quantity of the water, in some measure resembles the peculiarity, I have just exposed: and we are of opinion that the validity of baptism is no more absolutely determined by the quantity of the element, than the reality of the eucharist is ascertained by that of the bread and wine. So that, when a body of people can, for fuch a comparative trifle, separate from their brethren, and reprefent them as unbaptized; we are forry for the bigotry that lies at the root of fuch feparation, and cannot help fmiling at the poor arguments, on which they ground their uncharitable fchism.-But even supposing, I had indulged a degree of ridicule, from the prefs, when exposing the abfurd claims of bigotry; yet how does this admit a parallel with the conduct of Mr. M? who vents his ridiculous fallies of wit in a folemn ordinance? Whatever may be my private fentiments, or however I might avail myfelf of a few of those liberties generally allowed the pen of controvertists; yet I defy any person living to prove, that I ever threw out the smallest ungenerous reflexion against Anabaptists or their fentiments from the pulpit; * even though a fecond visit from Mr. M. repeated not long after the former, and conducted with the fame spirit of dogmatic assurance, afforded ground for sufficient provocation. But, I hope my mind is impressed with too deep a fense of the importance of my ministerial work; the solemnity of public ordinances; the weight of the fundamental truths of the gofpel; the awful capacity of an embassador of Christ; the reverential gravity that should run through all our ministrations; and of the value of immortal fouls; ever to call off the attention of my hearers from truths of infinite importance to comparative trifles; to amuse them with laughable sallies of vulgar witticisms, at the expence, perhaps of truth,

^{*} I the rather mention this, because one of the twin-disputants has infinuated, in his wonderful piece of classical patch-work, that I have, in my public discourses, thrown out as severe things on the subject of Infantbaptism, as Mr. M. did, on that of dipping. I beg to know whether this reverend patch-maker's infinuation be founded on ear-witness or mere information. If on the latter, which I am pretty fure must be the case, then he is guilty of the very crime, for which he has abused me in "immense stores of classical" rhodomontade; only with this essential difference, that my charge of fevere ridicule, brought against Mr. M. is founded on stubborn fact; his (the patch-maker's) information, respecting me, on notorious falshood, To the best of my recollection, I never, fince I came to this place, faid any thing on the fubject of baptifm, but on two occasions; once, only en passant, in a discourse on Isa. lii; and once in an evening exposition of I Cor. x. On both occasions, I simply and very concifely delivered my fentiments, as a Minister of the Church of England; without offering any controversial attack upon those, who might differ from me. And as to any ridicule, it was as far from my thoughts, or my manner of delivering them, as Mr. M.'s declamations were from decency and candor. For the truth of this, I appeal to all who attend my ministry.

as well as decorum; and much less to insist on what Dr. Stennett very properly calls "invidious "topics of argument," calculated to scatter abroad the sparks of unhallowed zeal, and to convert the sacred desk into a rostrum of ridicule, as well as the whole ordinance, into a fort of pantomime entertainment.

V. Before I actually begin the debate on the mode of baptism, it will be necessary to state a few preliminaries. (1) The controversy between us and the Anabaptists, respecting the mode, turns on the following point; viz. Whether the 'idea of dipping is effentially or only included in the words Caπ ιζω and Caπ ισμω; or whether their fignification comprehends other modes of applying the baptismal water. The Anabaptists, in afferting the former, consequently deny the latter. (2) It is readily allowed, that dipping is one of the included ideas of the original word; but, not the only one. And we are bold to declare, that 'to attribute the idea of dipping ONLY, to the word baptize, is to misinterpret the oracles of God, to fet scripture against itself, to be wife above that which is written, and groflly to overlook the real import of the original, merely for establishing a favorite but unimportant ceremony.' † (3) It is allowed, that baptism has often been administered, in former S 2 times.

[†] This declaration which I made in p. 20, of my Letter to a Baptiss-minister, Mr. M. quotes no less than four times in the compass of a few pages. His manifest design in vaporing away on this passage, is, to exhibit me as afferting, what seems to contradict the sentiments of the Church of England. But if this disingenuous quoter and his demi-reve-times, by immersion. But as this mode of administration was adopted, according to the nature of the climate, the age, or state of the subject, &c. it was, on the same principle, altered and varied, as circumstantials suggested. And, even in warm countries, where the objection to dipping had less force, than in our northern climates, yet it was thought necessary frequently to deviate from this mode; nor was such deviation ever supposed to weaken, much less to destroy, the essence of the sacrament. The apposite concession of Tilenus is most remarkable. "Although immersion might have been formerly more" (not altogether) "usu-" al, especially in Judea and other warm coun-rend subaltern in Salop, who joins with him in a fimilar strain of criticifm, had but candidly compared me with myfelf; they might have at once discovered the injustice and futility of their observations. I said, in p. 17 of my Letter, that 'the idea of dipping is not effentially connected ' with the word baptize.' Did not that manifestly imply a concession, that the idea is fimetimes connected with it? And did not my very quotation from Leigh's Critica Sacra imply so much? So that, to any ingenuous person, my saying that 'to attribute the idea of dipping to the word baptize, is to mifinterpret the oracles of God,' would imply no more, than that the confining the word to that idea only, comes under the charge of fuch minnterpretion. However, if Mr. M. still thinks, I have faid any thing derogatory to the fentiments of the Church of England, which needs a reprehension from my diocesan, he is heartily welcome to transmit his complaints, as soon, and as particularly as possible. But the frequent honorable mention I have made of our Church, as well as the respectful testimony I have borne to her discipline and ecclefiaftical governors, will fo effectually confront the flandcrous imputation of my false accuser; that if he were even to go in proprial perfinal, with his complaint about what he impertinently calls " my fneer," I might expect fuch a candid hearing from my diocefan as would justify my fentiments, and put the officious Anabaptist to shame. If ever he accosts me again, with a piece of fimilar impertinence, I request he would look into the Preface of Mr. De Coetlogon's Sermons; where he will fee another candid thought respecting the lawn-sleeves; and then he may link us both together in a charge of sneering, and propose our being "called to answer for it," " tries.

" tries, than aspersion; yet, fince this circum-" flance" (viz. of dipping) " does not pertain to " the fubstance of baptism; the analogy of the " facrament may be preferved, NO LESS by fprink-" ling, than by dipping." * (4) It is a fact not to be denied, that the Church of England admits dipping as one mode of administering baptism: but, contrary to the bigotry of Anabaptism, she acknowledges other modes of administration as equally valid; doubtless for the judicious reason affigned by Dr. Lightfoot. " The application of " water is necessary, as to the essence of baptism; " but, the application, by this or the other mode," " expresses the circumstance." § (5) The Anabaptists in this kingdom, who constantly immerse their candidates, in order to argue confishently with their practice, are obliged strenuously to maintain, that neither the original, nor any analogical reasoning from correspondent scriptures, nor any precedent, nor the differences of climates, nor the fituation of invalids or pregnant women, warrant the difpenfing of baptism by pouring or sprinkling of water. As this is not the proper place to undertake a refutation of fuch a wild position, I shall therefore difmiss it, with only observing, that the Anabaptists in Holland dissent from their brethren in this kingdom, and relax the rein of bigotry fo far, as to practice affusion. (6) The Anabaptists infist that the word baptize always fignifies to dip. But they are obliged, if they would be confistent, to go farther, and affert that it implies fuch dipping, as supposes the party to be wholly buried under the water. For, if one fcripture-instance can be produced, where a partial immersion is called a baptism, or where a person or thing is faid to be baptized, when only a part has been washed with water; then all their arguments for a total immersion fall to the ground. Many such instances I hope to produce from the word of God; and shall strengthen my observations on this head, by the concessions of Dr. Gale. (7) Though it be acknowledged that fome Pædobaptists have granted the propriety of baptizing by immersion; yet furely this will not ferve the cause of Anabaptism, unless it could be demonstrated to be the opinion of the majority. Befides, will Anabaptifts, who applaud the candid fentiments of fome Pædobaptifts respecting the mode, admit their testimony on the subject of Infant-baptism? Would they act thus fairly by fome of the authorities they quote, I know of none whose fentiments are more express or formidable against Anti-pædobaptism, than their favorite Dr. Whitby. (8) When Anabaptists quote passages from authors, on the mode of baptizing, and the fignification of the original word, they either fo manifestly curtail the passages they quote, or keep wholly out of fight the real fentiments of the author, as to make him appear an advocate advocate for total immersion, as the essence of the facrament. A few charges of this kind, I promife to make good against Dr. Stennett, in his quotations from Calvin, Beza, Vossius, &c. (9) I beg the judicious reader, once for all, to remember, that when Anabaptists produce instances, where Εαπρίζω fignifies to dip, they take pains to prove, what we never denied; viz. that dipping is not excluded from the fignification of the original word; and, many voluminous treatifes they have thrown away upon this needless subject. But, if they intend that their reasoning should amount to conclusive argument, and that their fentiments should keep pace with their avowed practice, they ought to prove, that the controverted word fignifies to dip ONLY; and by a total immersion: that the facrament is invalidated by every other mode of applying the baptismal water: that scripture furnishes not a single instance of the use of the word baptize or baptism, where a washing in part is implied: and that the authors, they produce as countenancing their fentiments, never acknowledge, that other modes of facramental washing, are equally valid with that of dipping.-'Till they prove these particulars, they prove nothing: and that they never have proved them, it shall be my business to demonstrate, in the following sheets.

C H A P. IV.

Dr. Stennett's and Mr. M.'s arguments, in favor of total immersion, drawn from the use of the word com and the Hebrew tebel, proved to be weak and fallacious.——Memorable concessions from Dr. Gale considered.

IN the management of controversy, there are certain rules of argumentation, which controvertiffs are respectively to observe, in order to keep up both the decorum and perspicuity of logical reasoning. One of these established rules, is, Neuter disputantium alterius partes suscipiat; neque opponens in partem respondentis involet, aut contra. I Whether my redoubtable antagonist is in the least acquainted with this rule, or the requisition it enjoins, the following specimen of his controversial abilities, will abundantly indicate. In p. 15, he maintains that "baptism always signifies dipping." And how do you think, reader, he fets about proving this unguarded position? Why thus. "This I most certainly do, 'till the idea is proved erro-" neous. Do you prove it if you can." So here our wonderful logician, first, gives us his positive affertion; and, when the business of proving manifestly devolves on him as the opponent, he relinquishes his proper fide of the disputation, and calls upon me to prove the negative; not knowing that the proof lies not on the respondent, but upon the opponent, who is the afferter: according to the well-known maxim in argumentation, Negantis non est probare: Asserenti incumbit probatio. From this curious specimen of our author's controverfial decorum, the reader may judge, whether it is not an unpleasing task to face a disputant, whose undemonstrated affertions are often made to rest upon the nugatory foundation of a "most certainly;" and by whose palpable ignorance of the laws of disputation. I am affigned the double office of proving the positive of my own affertions, and the negative of his. Indeed, it is not because I deem our author himself, an object worth contending with, that I bestow a little labor in exposing his notorious disqualification for controversy; but because I hereby possess a favorable opportunity at the fame time, of attacking, through his fides, the monster bigotry, and the great Diana of Anabaptism, in which it is enshrined. -But our author is no less fallacious in the mode, than he is deficient in the matter of disputation. A slight attention to a few of his arguments on dipping, will discover this.

I. In order to ascertain the fignification of certain words, or phrases, occurring in sacred writ, it is necessary to compare scripture with scripture, and hereby to make the word of God its own interpreter. This mode of interpreting scripture felf-compared, I have adopted, in investigating the import of the word baptize; that I might thereby demonstrate, how futile and ill-grounded are the fentiments of Anabaptists, who would infinuate, that it always implies a total immersion, and that any other mode of dispensing baptism is unscriptural. In order to point out the various use of the controverted word, I laid before Mr. M. in p. 16, 17, of my Letter, eight texts of scripture, whose respective correspondence with each other, proves, that the terms baptizing and sprinkling, pouring out, and even falling upon, are used synonymously in scripture. Let us see, what our author has to say against this.

1. "Your quotation and comparison of several feriptures, which next follow, 1s! * very weak, and proves nothing so much, as your peculiar dexterity, in confounding one thing with another." p. 16. How my "comparison of several feriptures" should be "very weak," and nevertheless indicate "peculiar dexterity," appears to me rather paradoxical; if not self-contradictory. And whether a comparing of scripture with scripture be a likely way to consound one thing with another, I leave the judicious reader to determine.

2 But let our author go on. "You have con"founded and mixed together" (crambe repetita)
"the fprinkling of the blood of Christ, the bap"tisin of the Holy Ghost, and water-baptism."

^{*} What grammar! This is the gentleman, that has affected to criticife upon others. Whether he, and his corrector of the press, under whose banner he florishes away, have any just claim to criticism, let the above sentence testisy. But instances of this nature, are quite common from the accurate pens of the critical duamvirate, Mr. M. and Mr. J.

That

That I have reasoned analogically from the one to the other, and drawn a natural inference, as to the validity of sprinkling and pouring of water in baptism, is certain; but I am not conscious of having mixed or confounded the one with the other, and I hope the candid reader will acquit me from the charge.—" You tell us indeed that emerically " and Earlie are fynonymous." I do not. What I fay, is, 'that baptizing and falling upon are used 'fynonymously.' There is a manifest difference between faying, that certain words are USED synonymously; and that they ARE synonymous. My mode of expression implies, that, though the words are contrary quoad terminos, as to the terms, yet they are fynonymous quoad analogiam, as to their analogical use in scripture. You argue analogically, in favor of immersion, from the Apostle's saying, "Ye are buried with him by baptifm, &c." Tho' a burial and a baptism are terms not strictly synonymous, yet I suppose you would not scruple to affert that these words are used synonymously. In like manner do I argue respecting the mode of baptism by pouring of water. As the apostle Peter fays that the Gentiles were baptized when the Holy Ghost fell on them; so, we affert, that water poured out or falling upon the person to be baptized, constitutes a real baptism; and that the terms therefore admit a fynonymous analogy: And the fame mode of analogical reasoning we adopt, from the words of the prophet Joel ii. 28, quoted by Peter in Acts ii. and compared with verse 33 of that chapter.

chapter. The LORD promises by the prophet that he would "pour out his Spirit on all sless." The fulfilment of this promife is attested by the apostle; who uses the very same word, to express the baptism of the disciples on the day of Pentecost. If ever therefore the force of analogical argument be allowed, furely it ought in the prefent firiking instance. And if it be admitted, then the following argument, in favor of baptizing by effusion of water, is irrefragable, viz. If according to the correfpondent testimonies of Joel and Peter, the apostles were baptized by the pouring out of the Spirit; then perfons may, with fcriptural propriety, be baptized by the pouring out of water: for if the term be used to express the mode of communicating the THING fignified in baptism, i. e. the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghoft; it ought confequently to be appropriated to the fign, and must necessarily point out a mode of administering it. And, it affords me not a little pleafure, that I have the opinion of fo great a man as Vossius, to give a fanction to this analogical inference, drawn from the aforefaid correspondent scriptures. " But, from the other opinion, "by which to baptize fignifies to wash, it is trans-" ferred to the gift of the Holy Spirit; to wit, " because, that he might wash the foul, he is poured " out on it, like water: as Joel faith, chap. ii. 28, " and Peter, Acts ii. 17, and likewise Paul, Tit. iii. 6. He hath faved us by the washing of regenera-" tion, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he hath POURED " POURED OUT, &c." + To this apposite declaration of Vossius, give me leave to add the correspondent testimony of CHEMNITIUS, who slorished A. D. 1565. This able examiner of the decrees of the Popish council of Trendt, thus expresses himself on the mode of baptism. "Paul, " that infallible interpreter fays, that to baptize,

" is to cleanse by the washing of water through the " word. Eph. v. Tit. iii. Acts ii. Whether the " administering the water be performed by dip-

" ping, tinging, pouring OR sprinkling, it is a bapti-" zation; for, it is a cleanfing or wathing by water.

" Nor is dipping under water necessarily requisite " to washing.—The command of Christ therefore

" is, that in baptifm there be a washing by water. "But, by what mode it should be performed, whe" ther by dipping, tinging, pouring or sprinkling,

" Christ has no where prescribed." *

3 On the preceding testimonies of these two great men, I beg leave to make a few remarks. (1) It is evident they both concur, in referring to the very scriptures, in Joel and the Acts, on which I ground my observations respecting the validity of baptism by pouring of water. (2) It is equally manifest, that they adopt the same mode of reasoning analogically from the manner of the Spirit's effusion, to the correspondent mode of administering baptism. And furely the testimony of two fuch great men to the propriety of fuch analogical reasoning, is of much greater weight, than the pitiful criticisms of Mr. M. or of his oracle, Dr. Stemett. (3) According to the same learned men, baptism fignifies washing; of which there are various modes; and that as pouring of water is one, it is confequently a fignificant mode of administering baptifm; for it exhibits an emblematical representation of the pouring-out of the Spirit, and of the washing of regeneration. (4) In opposition to the fentiments of Anabaptists in general, and of Dr. Stennett in particular, Chemnitius fays, "dip-" ping under water is not necessarily requisite to " washing;" consequently not essential to the mode of dispensing baptism. For, as Dominicus Sotus fays. "In baptifm, fomething concerns the ef-" sence, as washing; according to that in Ephes. v. " where the apostle calls baptism the washing of " water: but fomething is accidental; as whether " the washing be performed by this or the other " mode." +

II. But

II. But let us now fee, what Mr. M. has to fay in favor of immersion, from the supposed analogy between the baptisin of the Spirit and his favorite mode of baptizing. "The baptifin of the Holy "Ghost (by the way) does not at all favor your " notion of fprinkling; with much greater pro-" priety, the disciples might be faid to be im-"merged or overwhelmed in IT!" If Mr. M. intends baptism as the antecedent to IT, I need not advertise the judicious reader, that as baptism with Mr. M. always fignifies immersion, to fay, the difciples were overwhelmed or immerged in immersion, favors a little of what he is pleafed to call a "critical error." * But if the Holy Ghost is intended as. the antecedent to it; furely, to fay "the disci-" ples were immerged in the Holy Ghoft," is an extremely harsh and uncouth phrase.

But let us fee, how he attempts to support his analogy.—" For it filled, not only all the house "where they were sitting, but each of their hearts also; they were covered without and filled within. Well might they be said to be baptized with the Holy Ghost. But in all this, there is not one word of what you contend for." If by all this Mr. M. means, all this curious reasoning of his; I grant that there is "not one word in it" of rational argument, well-supported analogy, or solid sense—the things, for which at

^{*} By a "critical error" I suppose Mr. M. means an error in criticism; as I, by a "facramental error" intend an error respecting the facrament of baptism. If the latter be an expression "peculiarly my own;" so, by a parity of reasoning, the former is an expression "peculiarly Mr. M.'s own. Thus the mighty critic keeps me in countenance, by adopting the very mede of "critical error," which he blames.

present "I contend." But if by "all this" he mean, all the circumstances attending the effusion of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, as recorded in Acts ii. I will venture to affert, that there is not only "one word" but more than one argument, in that remarkable paffage, on which to ground an allusion in favor of baptizing by pouring or fprinkling of water. Of this I hope the reader has received fome degree of fatisfactory proof already: and I promife him a little additional evidence in a few more strictures on the subject. Not to urge, that the baptism of the Spirit, according to the joint testimonies of an apostle and a prophet, is mentioned in the very term pouring out; I ask by what authority, does Mr. M. accommodate the word "covering" to the circum-flances of that event? May I not juftly adopt his own phraseology, and say, "In all this" passage, "there is not one word" about covering, nor any apposite analogy, between filling and dipping? In order to detect the fallacious abfurdity of Mr. M.'s reasoning on this head, proceed we to a fair examination.

I Mr. M. fays, the disciples were "covered" without and filled within," and therefore that "they might with great propriety be said, to "be immerged or overwhelmed in the Holy Ghost." According to Mr. M.'s clumsy method of stating his analogical reasoning, drawn from the effusion of the Spirit, the reader would be apt to suppose, (if he had not his Bible to consult,) that the disciples were filled within, in the same way that they

they were covered without, and vice versa. But this strange confusion of circumstances is only the refult of Mr. M.'s muddled imagination. for the scripture account is, that when the difciples were affembled together, there "came a " found from heaven, as of a ruthing mighty " wind; and it filled all the house; where they " were fitting; and there appeared unto them " cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it fat upon " each of them." From hence it appears, that it was the wind, which filled the house; how, from the entrance of a ruthing wind, the disciples might be faid to be covered without, and how this covering of wind can possibly illustrate a baptism by water, appears to me the most far-fetched illustration I ever met with. But "they were " filled within." With what? Surely not with the wind. And yet, from our author's confused method of blending together the words, and in them, ideas, perfectly heterogeneous, one would imagine, he thought the disciples were filled with. in as well as covered without with wind. But what analogy can fubfift between filling within and dipping? And yet, if his illustrative imagination did not fancy fome fuch analogy; why did he connect the filling of the disciples' hearts by the influences of the Spirit, with, what he calls, the external "covering" of the wind? in order that, from this commixture of ideas, he might form a far-fetched illustration of dipping? And if he argue fairly from his own analogy; then baptism should be administered, not only by

by an external covering, but also by an internal filling with water; and that the practice of the dipper himself does not correspond with this branch of his analogical reasoning, I need not observe.

2 But, behold, reader, the amazing force of prejudice. The circumstance, which was intended principally to reprefent the effusion of the Spirit, viz. The descent and illapse of the Holy Ghost in the appearance of fire, Mr M. keeps wholly out of fight. His reason for so doing is obvious. This emblem would manifestly militate with his favorite idea of covering all over; and he would find it difficult to evade the force of the analogy between the pouring out of water in baptism, and the pouring out of the Spirit in the form of cloven tongues, which fat upon the apostles. I ask then any candid reader, whose practice is best supported by analogical argument, drawn from the effusion of the Spirit, mentioned in Acts ii? The Anabaptists, in order to give some color of reason for their favorite dipping, are driven to the necessity of confounding together the operation of the wind, which filled the house, where the apostles were assembled, and of the influences of the Spirit, which filled their hearts. From this inapposite combination of ideas they infer, what is apparently foreign from the fimilitude, and which nothing but an extravagant imagination, rendered ftill more fo by the violent impetus of bigotry, could possibly suggest. We, on the contrary, trary, adhering to the very words of scripture; guided by the correspondent testimony of a prophet and an apostle; and supported by the confonant opinion of two great men, Vossius and Chemnitius; maintain, that as the baptism of the Holy Ghost, on the day of Pentecost, is reprefented under the phrase which countenances our mode of baptizing; or as the apostles were said to be baptized, by the pouring out of the Spirit; therefore a baptifm of water, performed by pouring out of the facramentary element, is, to every purpose of scripture analogy, and emblematic representation, valid: according to those apposite passages of scripture; "I will pour water upon " him that is thirsty—I will pour my Spirit upon "thy feed—I will pour out my Spirit upon all feth—He hath exect poured out this, which ye " now fee and hear." Ifa. xliv. 3. Joel ii. 28. Acts ii. 33.

3 And now, as an additional evidence for the validity of administering baptism by pouring of water; and as a proof that the pretenders to criticism, are mistaken, when they aftert that εαπλίζω always signifies to baptize by dipping; I will lay before them a passage from an author which bids defiance to the abilities of Mr. M.'s oracle, or even to the prodigious critical powers of his reverend and accurate corrector of the press. The author is Origen. And the passage is the following. "How came you (Pharisees) to believe, "that Elias, when he should come, would bap-"tize: who did not in Ahab's time, baptize the

" wood on the altar, which required a washing, before it was burned by the LORD's appear-

", ing in fire? but he orders the priests to do "that.—He therefore that did not himself bap"tize them, but assigned that work (viz. of " baptizing) to others, how was he likely to bap-

" tize, when he, according to Malachi's prophe-

" cy, should come?" †

The text to which Origen refers, and on which he founds the above expossulation with the Pharises, is I Kings, xviii. 33. The words of which are, "Fill four barrels of water and POUR IT" ON the burnt-sacrifice, and on the wood." This POURING ON of water, Origen calls a BAPTISM of the wood and facrifice. An evident demonstration this, that the controverted word does not always signify to dip; and that, according to Origen, a person may be said to baptize, when he only pours water on the subject.

III. Our author, whose reasoning is as desultory, as his imagination is excursive, in order to invalidate, as he supposes, my analogical argument sounded on the circumstances of the baptism of the Spirit, makes an unexpected transition from the meaning of the word $\epsilon \omega \pi / \epsilon \omega$, to that of $\epsilon \omega \pi / \omega$. This sudden digression from the derivative to the primitive is the more extraordinary, as it is the former word only, that is used in the passage, we have been just considering. Probably so sudden a leap, which is quite in the retrograde fiyle too, might be occasioned by some fecret apprehension, that as the arguments drawn from the application of the one word, failed in conclusiveness, those founded on the other might help our author out, at a dead lift. But, he is not aware that to argue promiseuously from βαπθω to Caπ ιζω, is to confound together two words, in the application of which, the scriptures obferve a manifest distinction: for, whatever be the meaning of Caπlω, it is certain that it is never once used, to express the act of administering baptism; the derivative always occurs. But, if Caπ/ιζω, fignified always to dip as the Anabaptists affert its primitive invariably does; would not the inspired writers have used the one and the other indifferently? This they nave not done. No word but the derivative ever occurs, where baptism is mentioned; and if it did not carry a peculiar acceptation, why should the scriptures always adopt Carlica? What occasion for making a derivative, when according to Anabaptists, the primitive is intirely of the fame fignification?

1 But, however, as Mr. M. fancies his great-

eft strength lies in the arguments taken from the fignification of the primitive, it is fit I should let him have full scope. The passage he has chofen for that purpose is Dan. iv. 33; where the prophet fays, "Nebuchadnezzar was wet εβαφη "with the dew of heaven." On this Mr. M. observes.

observes, "the Greek word is the original of " ζωπλίζω." And what then? Why, nothing. He has drawn no inference from his premisses. But his meaning is, that, as the primitive is used to express a wetting, so must the derivative; and so far we have no objection to his conclusion. Nor can we have lefs to the concession, which follows. " Now we all admit that the dew did fall down "from heaven upon him." And in admitting this, you grant all we want, and manifestly give up the point. For if Nebuchadnezzar was wet or baptized by the dew falling down upon him, (I fay baptized; for you know you constantly affert that Canlw and Canliew are the fame) then, a perfon may receive a valid baptifin by the facramental water falling down upon him; and if this illustration does not, from the concessions of our dipper's own pen, justify our mode of baptism by pouring, wherein the water falls down upon the fubject; neither concessions nor illustrations have any meaning. So that, reader, I leave you to confider, whether or not Mr. M.'s acknowledgment here, does not 'corroborate all my preceding observations on this part of the subject, and overturn his own favorite hypothesis.

2 But, after admitting, what indeed he could not but admit, he foon flies off, and attempts an interpretation, favorable, as he supposes, to his idea of immersion. "But this was not intended "to be intimated by the aforesaid Greek word." What! Was not the wetting of Nebuchadnezzar's body by the dew falling down upon it, "intended " to be intimated" by the Greek word & Eaty? Will Mr. M. be so kind to inform us what was " intended to be intimated by it?" He fays; " the idea of his being overwhelmed in the dew." But the feptuagint version directly militates against this idea; for, it renders the words and the decore, from or by the dew. Had the expression been εις την δροσον, or εν τη δροσω, it might have in some measure countenanced Mr. M.'s idea of overwhelming: but to fay, that Nebuchadnezzar was dipt and from the dew, founds extremely harsh. Besides all the Latin versions, coinciding with the Septuagint, are against Mr. M.'s favorite idea. The Latin vulgate renders it, rore cali corpus ejus infectum erat; his body was dyed or stained with the dew of heaven. That of Tremellius and Junius, Rore cali, corpus ejus intinctum est; and Montanus's interlineary version, de rore cælorum corpus ejus tingebatur; his body was tinged or wet with the dew. From these unanimous interpretations of translators, the reader is to judge, whether they in the least correspond with the idea of overwhelming; especially when he remembers that not one of them here renders the word Com by immergo, and that the emphatic preposition in the feptuagint, on which the Latin versions are founded, is, not eig or ev, but ano. Were this the proper place, I might prove from various instances, exclusive of the argument taken from the natural meaning of the preposition ano, that even the primitive Caπ does not always fignify to dip, and even when it does, that it cannot imply a total immerfion. One instance however, I cannot omit. In the command given by Moses, respecting the paffover he fays, "Ye shall take a bunch of hyffop and dip it in the blood, &c. but the feptuagint Greek is, Calavies and TE aimalo, dying or smearing it with the blood. Exod. xii. 22. The Latin vulgate accordingly renders it, not immergite in fanguinem, immerse it in the blood, but tingite sanguine, dye it with the blood. In this passage, as in that respecting Nebuchadnezzar's wetting from the dew, we meet with the same primitive word Caπlw, and the same preposition aπε. If the fignification in the one instance cannot imply a total immersion, or any immersion at all; why may we not fairly infer a negative, in the other? Even supposing the bunch of hyssop was dipt, yet it could not be dipt all over in the blood: * to suppose that, would be ridiculous; confidering that one end of it was to be in the hand that used it. And, as the preposition owno never, that I recollect, fignifies in; to translate Carpailes απο τε αιμα To, "overwhelming in the blood," would incur an abfurd interpretation founded on a double miftake: and yet, that this should be the interpretation according to Mr. M.'s overwhelming ideas, is manifest.

3 But he is ready with an objection to all this. He fays "this idea is explained by Nebuchadnez-

^{*} Even Dr. Gale strengthens this observation, by a remarkable concession, which he drops in p. 146, of his reflexions on Wall's history of infant-baptism — a concession, which indeed he was obliged to make; and which I beg the reader never to lose fight of. "The word is $Ca\psi_{S}$, and plainly signifies to dip; though it was not dipped all over."

"the dew." p. 18. That is, reader, our author, if he knew how to cloathe his ideas in logical argument and in the plain dress of common grammar, would fay, 'it is recorded, that N. had his lodging in the dew: therefore he was overwhelmed in it.' And, what is quite extraordinary, he reafons by analogical inference from the state of N.'s body to the baptifin of the Spirit; faying, "So " in this baptism of the H.G. it was not intended " to intimate, by this word, the Spirit's falling " upon these converts, but that they were filled, and as tho! covered and overwhelmed with the " Spirit." Now, if there be any argument, illuftration or analogy in this almost unintelligible jargon, the following feems to be our author's meaning. q. d. Nebuchadnezzar was overwhelmed by the dew falling down upon him: fo the apostles were filled and as the' covered and overwhelmed with the Spirit falling on them. Here our author has shot a bolt, which it would be to his advantage, if practicable, to recal. If the apostles were " covered and overwhelmed with the Spirit" when it was poured out and rested on only a part of the body in the form of cloven tongues of fire, (for, these constituted the apposite emblem of the Spirit's effusion and influence on the day of Pentecost;) then, according to our candid analogist, a person may be said to be overwhelmed in baptism, when the water is only poured on a part of the body. Nor will the circumstance of their being filled within, invalidate, in the least, X

this conclusion; unless Mr. M. will affert, that perfons cannot be as completely filled with the influences of the Spirit in their hearts, who have been partakers of only an effusion of the baptismal water, as those who are immerged all over in it. And, if he reason indifferently, as he has done, from the baptism of the Spirit to the wetting of N.'s body by the dew; then it as naturally follows, that in the latter case there was a partial wetting, as in the former, there was a partial effufion. And yet, in order to preserve a strict refemblance between the one and the other, founded, as Mr. M. afferts, on the invariable fignification of Canla and Canlia, Nebuchadnezzar ought to have been filled within, as well as covered without by the dew; otherwise he could not be faid, with firich propriety, to be overwhelmed, according to the amazing profundity of Mr. M.'s overwhelming imagination.—See then, with what inextricable abfurdity, glaring felf-contradiction, and even palpable nonfense, his reasoning is embarrassed.

4 But Mr. M. is of opinion, that he is furnished with a formidable argument, in favor of immersion, because it is said, that N. should have his lodging αυλισθησεται IN the dew. And if I were disposed to argue in the same filly style, I might infer, that, as our Lord is said to have "lodged IN the mountain," ηυλιζετο εις το ορώ, Luke xxi. 37, therefore he must have been overwhelmed or covered with the mountain.—O but the "Chaldre word always signifies to be overwhelmed." I deny the affertion; and, as Mr. M.

has offered no proof, my fimple negative might, according to the laws of disputation, be allowed as a sufficient answer. Nevertheless, I will attempt to prove the negative; viz. that the Chaldee word does not always fignify to be overwhelmed. Dr. Stennett fays, the word in the Hebrew, by which the Jerusalem Targum renders the Chaldee, is tebel. If then an instance can be produced, where the Hebrew does not fignify overwhelming, Mr. M.'s argument necessarily falls to the ground. A remarkable instance occurs, Gen. xxxvii. 31, where Joseph's brethren are faid to have "dipped his coat in the blood" of the kid. The Hebrew word there is formed from tebel, which is the very word that according to Dr. S. agrees with that in Dan. iv. 23. Yet the Septuagint does not render it εβαιραν but 'εμολυναν τον χιτωνα τω αιμαζι, inquinárunt, they stained or besmeared the garment, &c. Befides, indeed, reason concurs in establishing this translation; for, furely, it is not to be supposed, that Foseph's brethren would immerge or overwhelm his garment in the blood; fince that very circumstance would manifestly tend to detect their crime, and to make their story about Joseph's being destroyed by a wild beast, to wear the appearance not only of improbability, but of palpable falfhood. The most natural supposition, is, that they stained some parts of the garment with the blood, fo as to prevent suspicion; and that this could be done without any immersion at all, is as certain, as, that the garment was not overwhelmed in, or covered over with blood. (1) That the controverted word word does not always fignify either to dip or to overwhelm, is evident, from the fignification of the root itself, and some of its branches. YIZY is the Hebrew for a Hyana; and is a participle from צבע; which participle, Trommius, in his Greek Concordance, under the word 'Yann, (Vol. ii. P. 567,) renders " coloratus;" and that he did not mean an universal coloring occasioned by a total dipping, or indeed by any dipping at all, in the prefent application of the word, is evident; because he immediately quotes the Dutch translators, faying, "Belg. befprincklet." i. e. BESPRIN-KLED. So that, according to Trommius, the word implies a coloring, performed by fprinkling; and from this idea, is applied to spotted animals. So Schindler, by a periphrafis, makes it the name of an Owl. Periphrasis noctuæ, quæ rubris maculis distincta est. * And Leigh says, " it is rightly " explained by Hieronymus, as fignifying dyed, " tinged or discolored; and by Kimchius, that which " is of various colors." The word is therefore applicable to any thing that is dyed, even where there is no dipping at all; as suppose, in the manner of coloring printed linen; or to any thing spotted by nature, as in the case of some animals. And, whether this interpretation, authenticated by Trommius, the Dutch Translators, Leigh, Schindler, Hieronymus and Kimchius, does not overturn the overwhelming affertions of Mr. M. for which he is indebted to Dr. S. and his oracle to Dr. Gale, I leave the critical reader to judge. (2) Because the noun אצבע fignifies a finger, it is therefore applied to birds of prey, who as Leigh fays, are uncis unguibus DIGITATI: Junius and Tremellius accordingly translate the septuagint Greek 'vocum, digitatum avem, in Jer. xii. 9; and our English translation, abiding by the Hebrew, renders it speckled. The only difficulty here, is to ascertain the analogy or correspondence between the Hebrew root, and its branch; and between both, and the Greek, Latin and English translations. The most natural interpretation feems to be this .-The Hebrew word fignifies a finger or talon: and because animals armed with talons, or as Leigh fays, uncis unguibus DIGITATA, stain themselves with the blood of their prey, therefore the word is descriptive of carnivorous animals, * spotted either by nature or by accident. Hence the same judicious lexicographer gives us the following appofite criticism; Recte fortassis reddatur rubefacta, scilicet, seu sanguine infecta vel cruentata, seu cruenta & carnivora animalia. And the judicious Poole fays, in his Annotations, "The word in the Heb. fignifies to dye or color; and interpreters are here divided, whether to interpret it of a bird colored by nature (fo our translators understood it, and therefore have translated it speckled) or by accident, as ravenous birds," (or beafts) "are colored by the blood of other birds killed by them." It feems to me, however, that, if we are to argue naturally from the root to the branch, or from the cause to the effect; because birds or beasts uncis unguibus digitata, color themselves with the blood of their prey, therefore the Hebrew word is transferred to any animals speckled by nature as well as spotted through accident. And, if we apply these correspondent criticisms to the point in debate; is it not evident that, fince the Hebrew word is used for a thing spotted or speckled, whether by nature or accident, therefore it cannot possibly be confined to the idea of dipping? and much less to that of overwhelming? unless the Anabaptists will infift that immersion is effential to the spotting or fpeckling of any thing, or that it cannot be colored without being dipt? which furely they will not be fo abfurd as to maintain, in the face of stubborn matter of fact. So that the critical reader may judge, when Dr. S. from Gale, and Mr. M. from his oracle, triumphantly declare, that the Chaldee word in Daniel always fignifies to dip or overwhelm, whether their triumph is not that of an unsupported ipse dixit, rather than of truth and folid criticism. And the reader, is to judge, whether he will be more fafe in taking up a fentiment upon trust, because positive men advance it? or in adhering to the testimony of such critics and lexicographers, as Trommius and Leigh? whose concurrent criticisms are founded on the analogy of scripture?

(3) That the Hebrew word in Daniel cannot always fignify dipping is evident from the Latin words, by which lexicographers translate it. Leigh in his Critica Sacra, translates it by the words. madefacio, colore inficio, coloro; to wet, stain, color. And whether a thing cannot be wet, stained or colored, without dipping, I need not inform the reader. Trommius and Scapula and all the critics in the world, translate it by tingo, as well as mergo; and always suppose a difference between these two Latin words; to the former of which, Lyttleton in his Latin Dictionary, beside other fignifications, gives that of "sprinkling." But of this, I propose giving farther proof in another place. In the mean time, the reader is to judge, how much Mr. M. has got by his boasted istavang; a word which he has borrowed, and fo spoiled in borrowing as to make nonfenfe of it. The next time he publishes, I would advise him, to get Dr. S. inflead of his critical aid-de-camp at Wrexham, to correct the press for him.

5 As Mr. M. feems to have borrowed the principal parts of his arguments and criticisms on the passage in Dan. from Dr. S. the absurdity and mistakes which he has retailed, necessarily originate from his oracle. Consequently the arguments, wherewith I have overthrown the critiques of the former, equally invalidate the force of the following assertion from the latter. "Admitting that there is a difficulty in this passage (of Dan.) it is to be observed, that the word (Canla) in most other places, where the Septuagint use it,

" fo necessarily fignifies dipping, that it is impos-" fible for our author or any one else, to give it a different meaning." I am glad the Doctor acknowledges there is fome "difficulty" in the passage he alludes to; and I hope when he more maturely reviews the arguments of his opponents, he will find there lies in the way of his strained interpretation a greater difficulty still. When he fays, that the word Carlo fignifies dipping in " most " other places" of the Septuagint; he comparatively fays nothing: because, unless he can prove, that it has that fignification in all other places, he does not prove his point; for, a fingle instance, wherein it fignifies a wetting by effusion or asperfion of water, or even a partial immersion, overturns all his arguments; fince the Doctor, and every advocate for total immersion, as the effence of the mode, are obliged, if they would not incur the charge of inconfistency, to maintain that both Caπ and Caπ ιζω fignify to dip-that they always have that fignification-and both the one and the other always fignify to dip by a total immersion.

6 However, if the testimony of other critics and divines may be supposed of equal weight with that of Dr. S. or his borrower in Liverpool, I beg leave to lay before the reader the concurrent opinion of two persons, who manifestly differ from the two Anabaptists. The first of these two great men, is, the learned Dr. Pocock. Respecting the signification of the Hebrew tebel, he says, after acknowledging it signifies to dip, yet adds, "it "does not necessarily point out a dipping of the "whole body." The other is Schindler, who renders the Hebrew word tinxit, intinxit, and further adds, "Ita lavit, ut res non mundetur, sed tantum ATTINGAT humorem, vel totâ, vel EXPARTE."

III. From the foregoing observations, I hope, it has been made appear, how fallacious and inconclusive is Mr. M.'s reasoning about the necessity of preferving the idea of covering or overwhelming all over, in order to keep up a proper analogy between the pouring out of the Spirit on the apostles, and that of the dew on Nebuchadnezzar. And here I cannot help expressing my aftonishment, that Mr. M. or Dr. S. or any other Anabaptist should so strenuously contend for a total immerfion in baptifm, fince they themselves are reduced to the inevitable necessity of acknowledging, with Dr. Gale, " that the word (baptize) " does not always necessarily imply a total immer-" fion, or dipping the whole thing spoken of all " over; which (adds the Doctor) I readily allow. "For, what is true of any ONE part, may be faid of the WHOLE complexly." But the Doctor drops another still more remarkable concession, in p. 117, of his Answer to Wall. " The word " Caπlιζω, does not so necessarily express the " action of putting under water; as in general, a " thing's being in that condition, no matter how " it comes fo; whether it is put into the water or " the water comes over it." Whether this gentleman has not by these unfortunate declarations

given up the whole matter at once; betrayed the cause of Anabaptism; and rendered a great part of his voluminous Answer to Mr. Wall nugatory and superfluous, I leave the reader to judge. And that our mode of administering baptism by pouring or sprinkling of water, is strictly justisfiable, even our opponents themselves being judges; I hope to make evident, in a few observations on the above

MEMORABLE CONCESSIONS Of Dr. Gale, the Anabaptist.

I. As to the meaning of the Greek word $\omega \pi h \zeta \omega$, the Doctor confesses, that, "it does not so neces" farily express the action of putting under water, "as in general, a thing's being in that condition;" and he exemplifies this declaration, by the state of a sea-coast, which, according to Aristotle, was not baptized, at low water; so that as the coast was not put into the water, but the water came in upon the coast, it is on this circumstance, that he sounds his ingenious concession. If then, according to the Doctor, $\omega \pi h \zeta \omega$ does not express the action of putting under water, it certainly is applicable to the situation of a person, upon whom water is poured; and such a person may be said to be baptized:

II. If it be urged, that dipping, not pouring or fprinkling, is necessary to baptism; I answer, that cannot be, according to Dr. Gale: for, he declares, that "a thing" may be baptized, if it be under water, "NO MATTER HOW IT COMES SO."

And furely, a person may be under water, when it falls upon him in the distillations of the rain or dew; as in the case of Nebuchadnezzar. So that, as it is "no matter how" the water comes over him; consequently, if the person to be baptized, is under the droppings of the baptismal water, administered either by effusion or aspersion, his baptism is valid.

III. But it will be infifted, that, admitting the indifference of the mode, by which a person may be faid to be under water, yet that there should be a sufficiency of the element to cover him all over. But this requisition is inconsistent with Dr. G.'s concessions: for, even when he is so felfcontradictory, as to infift on dipping, as effential to the due administration of the ordinance, yet he allows that a total immersion is not necessary; and, as his own concessions justify the baptifm of an individual, when he is not put under water, but when the water comes over him, " no matter how;" therefore, if an immerging only a part may, according to the Doctor, be called a valid baptism of the whole person; so may, by a parity of reasoning, a pouring or sprinkling of water on a part, be termed a baptism of the whole man; according to a favorite maxim of the Doctor, "What " is true of ANY ONE part, may be said of the " WHOLE complexly."

IV. What becomes then of all the arguments of Anabaptists, in favor of total immersion. Are they not all rendered sutile and nugatory? Yea, are they not perfectly annihilated by the following never-to-be-forgotten concession of their champion Dr. Gale, which crowns the whole? " I readily allow, that the word (baptize) does " not necessarily imply a total immersion." Yea, he so far justifies the validity of a partial immersion, as to declare the thing or person dipped, when only a part of either is immerfed. This concession he illustrates by the example of the hyffop mentioned Exod. xii. 22, and that of a pen. Respecting the former, he acknowledges, that the hyffop itself might be faid to be dipt, " though not dipt all over." And as to the flate. of a pen dipt he fays, "Though the whole pen " is not dipt all over; yet THE PEN MAY BE " TRULY SAID TO BE DIPT according to that "known rule: What is true of any ONE part, may

V. When Dr. G. fays, p. 168. "If the word " does but fignify to dip, let it relate to the " whole body, or a part of it only, I ASK NO " MORE;" does he not ask much less than will fuit the cause of Anabaptism, or give the least color of rational argument to the whole of his tedious animadverfions on Wall? And what has the verbose reflecter been contending for? that Caπ ω and Caπ ιζω fignify to dip? Alas! he might have spared all his unmeaning verbofity; for that his antagonist never denied. Had his proofs been at all to the purpose, they should have demonfrated, that the Greek words are perfectly the fame, and always fignify to dip; or that their fignification will admit of no other valid mode of applying the baptismal water, but by immersion.

Has he proved this? No; his own concessions illustrated by the state of Nebuchadnezzar's body, as well as that of the fea-coast in Aristotle, are plump against him; and particularly his apposite maxim, that a person or thing is baptized, if it be under the water, " no matter how it comes so; whether it " be put into the water, or whether the water " comes over it."-Has he proved that a total immersion is essential to the mode of baptism? No; that he has absolutely given up. By acknowledging, when a part only of the hy/lop was dipt in the blood, and the nib of the pen only is dipt in the ink, that both the hyffop and pen might nevertheless, be faid to have been dipt; he manifeftly allows a partial dipping in baptifin. For, if his maxim, "What is true of any ONE part, is " true of the WHOLE complexly," be applicable to the case of the hyssop and pen; it is consequently of force in respect to baptism; and so indeed the " deeply-learned Doctor" as the twin-disputant flyles him, acknowledges; "Let the word relate " to the whole body or a part of it, I ask no more." And we "ask no more" to prove, that the candid Doctor feems to have not fufficiently weighed the consequence of his own declarations.—We "afk no more" to prove, that his concessions fully justify the modes of baptizing by pouring, sprinkling; and that the dipping any part of the body is as valid a baptifm, even in the Doctor's own estimation, as an immersion of the whole.-We "afk no more" to prove, that the "deeplylearned" Doctor has amaffed together a prodigious gious cargo of quotations from authors facred and profane, to no purpose; fince ten thousand instances, wherein Canlila signifies to dip, are of no fervice to the cause; unless they excluded every other fignification, and proved that it invariably fignified to dip all over .- And " we ask no more" to prove, that, when the Anabaptists of the day, always and in every case, practise a total dipping; they act with that unrelaxing sliffness, which is a peculiar characteristic of downright bigotry; and, that when fo trivial a circumflance, as a non-agreement with them refpecting the quantity of water or the mode of application, will induce them to fland aloof from their brethren; they too manifestly class with those who make the kingdom of God to confift as much in meat and drink, as in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; and are real objects of pity, if confidered as under the unhappy influence of that bigotry, which prompts them to contend for what is absolutely indefensible even upon the declarations of the literary Goliah of their cause.

C H A P. V.

BAPTISMAL ASPERSION an emblematical representation of our justification by the blood, and of our sanctification by the Spirit of Christ.—The objections of Mr. M. and his oracle on this head, confronted with scripture, reason, and the striking testimonies of Calvin, Beza, Tilenus, Vossius, Lightfoot, &c.—Dr. S.'s criticism on the διαφοροις βαπίσμοις divers baptisins, mentioned in Heb. ix. 10; as well as his wonderful doctrine of genus and species, by which it is supported, proved to be equally fallacious and absurd.

S we argue analogically from the pouring out of the Spirit to the correspondent mode of baptizing by pouring of water; so we think that the same kind of reasoning is of sorce, in order to warrant the administering of the ordinance by sprinkling. As our fanctification by the Spirit, and our justification by the blood of Christ, are frequently mentioned under that term; and as both are emblematically represented in baptism; we therefore maintain, that the ordinance, sounded on this natural analogy is duly administered by aspersion. Mr. M. therefore, when in his usual cavalier style he asks, p. 18, "What becomes of your sprinkling many "nations, sprinkling clean water, and pouring out "of the Spirit, which are all figurative?" instead of invalidating, in the least, those arguments, which which I laid before him on a former occasion; rather fuggests a hint, which corroborates mine, and enervates the force of his own reasoning: for, when he acknowledges the above expressions are "figurative," he manifestly grants they contain a figure of fomething; which, I suppose, he will acknowledge to be that of a finner's justification by the fprinkling of the Redeemer's blood; and of his renewal, by the sprinkling of his Spirit, under the emblem of clean water. If then, the sprinkling of blood, the sprinkling of water, and the pouring out of fire, are fignificantly "figurative" of our justification and fanctification; why may not the sprinkling or pouring out of water, be a proper figure of these two blessings, in the administration of baptism? and consequently, why may not the ordinance, representing such a figure, be properly difpenfed in either mode? Had the scriptures, alluded to, been couched in the following terms, " He shall dip many nations-I " will wash you in clean water,—the baptism of " the blood of CHRIST, &c. how readily would " our adverfaries have urged their strong allusion " to dipping! But, because the terms manifestly countenance the contrary mode; therefore their allusive analogy in favor of sprinkling, &c. is quite inadmissible; and, any attempt to argue analogically from the sprinkling of the blood of CHRIST to the validity of baptizing by a correspondent aspersion of water, only furnishes them with a fresh opportunity of discovering their (what Dr. S. calls) "bitter antipathy" to allusions and analogy ;

logy; for the use of which, at other convenient seasons they manifest the most partial veneration. Besides, if, because expressions are "figurative," they therefore "give no direction for water baptism," as Mr. M.'s clumsy diction afferts; what then will become of all the mighty arguments he deduces from the expression, "Ye are buried with him by baptism into death?" Whether, therefore, our author's reasoning, here, savors more of real or figurative nonsense, I leave to the judgment of the discerning reader.

As Mr. M. has simply hinted an objection or two against my allusive reasoning, without confidering one of the arguments, by which it is supported; I shall therefore take my leave of him for a moment, and face his oracle. Proceed we then to consider the ground of the Doctor's cavils against what we think the analogy between our mode of baptism by aspersion, and

I. The fprinkling of the blood of Christ. Against this he says, "This mode of adminif"tering the ordinance as an emblematical repre"fentation of our justification hath no foundation "in the word of God." In this affertion, equally bold as salse, the Doctor denies two things; first, that the baptismal washing is an emblem of our justification through the blood of Christ; secondly; and consequently, that the mode of administering baptism, founded on the supposed analogy, is unscriptural. From one of Dr. S.'s professed veneration for scripture and logic, one would not have expected fo rash a declaration; at least, we might have expected it couched in more diffident and modest language. But, what are the arguments, on which he grounds his negative? (1) He fays, "cleansing is much better "effected by dipping than sprinkling." But, as the question, is not, whether "cleansing is much " better effected by dipping than fprinkling," but whether it is effected at all by the latter; in order to give conclusiveness and confistency to his affertion, he should have roundly declared, that " cleanfing is never effected by sprinkling, but " always by dipping;" and then, tho' he would have uttered a glaring mistake, he would nevertheless have kept pace with the principle he is obliged, as an advocate for the effentiality of dipping, to maintain. His qualifying phrase, "much better," therefore, gives up the point, and proves his inconfishency. But when the Doctor infinuates, that, because the body is much better washed by dipping than fprinkling of water, therefore baptism is much better administered by immersion than afperfion; does he not implicitly grant, that baptizing by the latter mode is a good one? only, that the former is much better? And does not his own declaration justify, in some degree, the propricty of a baptism by sprinkling? When he founds an argument, against baptismal aspersion, on the quantity and particular mode of applying water, requifite to washing the body; is he not. aware, that, by demanding fuch exact correfpondence between the fign and thing fignified, he furnishes immersion, but even against every other mode of baptizing whatever. For, if dipping be a much better way of cleansing, than sprinkling; then a washing with soap, and in a large river, is a much better mode of cleanfing the body, than either; and according to our author's doctrine of restrictive analogy, ought to be practifed, in baptism. And, as the Doctor acknowledges, (p. 122) " that the word fprinkling is used to express clean-" fing," as in the case of the leper under the law; yet, to be confistent, he thould have maintained, that the cleansing of the leper would have been " much better" effected by his being dipt all over in the typical blood, than by being only sprinkled with it. See! in what abfurd trifling this mode of reasoning terminates! But, that the Doctor may be ashamed of such trifling, and not ashamed to give it up, upon the testimony of a great author, I will lay before him a part of Cyprian's letter to Magnus. "In the facrament (of bap-" tism) the contagion of sin is not washed away, " as the filth of the body is in a carnal bath, as that there should be any need of a feat to fit upon, " of soap, and a fish-pond, which are generally re" quisite to cleanse the body. The breast of a believer is washed in a DIFFERENT manner. " To those that believe, the divine abridgment

" divina compendia conveys the whole benefit." †

By the divina compendia, Cyprian means the compendious mode of baptizing by fprinkling; which he confirms and illustrates by the apposite fcriptures, Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26. Num. xix. 19, 20, and

chap. viii. 6, 7.

(2) The Doctor thinks he is furnished with a formidable argument against the scriptural validity of baptizing by aspersion, because, though a sprinkling under the law, was called a cleansing, yet it was a fprinkling by blood; and he thinks this difference in the matter totally invalidates the analogy. Thus he argues against Mr. Addington: "Nor should I have much wondered, if he had "added, that it feems to be most properly ad-" ministered, not only by sprinkling, but by " fprinkling blood instead of water." This is extremely specious, and favors not a little of plaufible fophistry. But the weakness and fallacy of fuch pitiable argumentation, may be eafily discovered by any one, who is conversant in the nature of scripture-allusions, and is, in any tolerable degree acquainted with the method of reasoning, our author himself adopts upon other occasions. The Doctor's objection, founded on the difference between blood and water, equally invalidates and overthrows fome of his own favorite allusions. For, if no analogy can be drawn from the manner of cleanfing by the sprinkling of blood, to a correspondent mode of administering baptism by water, because a sprinkling of blood is not a sprinkling by water; then, the same objection is of equal, if not greater force, against the Doctor's darling analogy from the baptism of the Spirit under the emblem of fire, to that of baptism by an immersion in water; because fire and water are elements diametrically opposite. So that, when the Doctor, by a strained fimilitude, represents and recommends immerfion under the figure of metal "laid under the " refiner's fire;" if I were disposed to turn the edge of his reasoning against himself, and to detect the weakness and sophistry of his objections to our allusive arguments in favor of sprinkling, I might, mutațis mutandis, say; "Nor thould "I have much wondered, if the Doctor had " added, that baptifm feems to be most pro-" perly administered by an immersion in fire " instead of water." And, by adopting the same mode of address which concludes p. 120, of his Remarks on Mr. Addington's Treatife, I might also with just retaliation of language, borrow his own words, and fay, "Let imagination have " its full scope: and then the question will be, " which has the happiest invention, our author, " or those who practifed a mock-baptism, by fire."

(3) From the following concession in p. 122, one would be almost inclined to think the Doctor was in a measure reconciled to our allusion in favor of sprinkling; at least that he intended meeting us half way. "What Baptist, Sir, is so "grievously offended with the word sprinkling," as not to allow it is ever used to express purifying

"fying or cleansing? I answer, Dr. S. is the "Baptist" who is thus "grievously offended;" otherwife, wherefore doth he suppose that our allufive arguments are the refult of an imagination, giving itself full scope, like that of Peter's fuccessor at Rome? But, notwithstanding the above concession, he says (p. 120) "nor hath the phrase " of the blood of sprinkling any the least reference " to baptism." That is, Dr. S. says so, and therefore to be fure, it must be so. But, has not baptifin the least reference to the blood of sprinkling? Yes, most certainly, the Doctor himself being witness: For he acknowledges that "the word " fprinkling is used to express cleansing." But cleanfing is used to express baptism as a washing with water. And as we are faid to be cleansed by the blood of sprinkling; yea, to be washed in it; Rev. i. 5; consequently the sprinkling of water in baptism is an apposite, fignificant, and scriptural representation of our justification by the blood of CHRIST. So that, as we are faid to be washed and cleansed by the blood of sprinkling; why may we not be faid to be facramentally washed by a baptism of sprinkling. Is not the validity of this mode established by the ceremonial cleansings by aspersion under the law, and the antitypical cleanfing under the gospel by the sprinkling of the blood of CHRIST? And has the Doctor urged one folid argument against this natural representation of the matter? Rather, has not his own concession, that "fprinkling is used to express " cleanfing" fully established the very sentiment

he intended to oppose? And, to prove that the argument, thus far has the fanction of an eminent lexicographer's concurring opinion, I need, only quote Leigh's Critica Sacra. Under the Greek word he fays, "In the facred scriptures it is spoken of baptism: Ephes. v, and in the epist. to Tit. chap. iii. It is metaphorically spoken of the blood of Christ, by which, our souls are washed and cleansed from the filth of sin."*

(4) Having thus far confidered, and I hope refuted too, the principal objections of the Doctor (for, arguments I cannot call them;) let us look back to his positive affertion in p. 120; where he fays, "this mode of administering the ordinance " as an emblematizal representation of our jus-" tification hath no foundation in the word of "Gop." I hope the reader has received fome fatisfactory evidence, that the Doctor's zeal here hath precipitated him into a manifest mistake: and, that the allufion contended for, has received not a little support from his own pen. He has acknowledged that "the word sprinkling is used " for cleansing;" and that there is an allusion to baptism in the term washing of regeneration. Now, if a thing sprinkled is faid to be cleansed, it may be with equal propriety faid to be woshed; fince the former is an effect and confequence of the latter: and fo indeed, what the apostle Paul calls " having the heart fprinkled from an evil con-

" fcience," St. John terms being " washed in his " blood," and "cleansed" by it from fin. Rev. i. 5. 1 John i. 7. But the term washing and the idea it implies is transfered to baptifm; confequently the scriptures represent it as an emblem of a fpiritual cleanfing; elfe, why do they use the phrases "washing of regeneration; washing of wa-" ter by the word; baptism doth now save us, not the " washing away the filth of the fleth, but the an-" fwer of a good conscience," rendered so, by the washing of the blood and Spirit of CHRIST? If therefore baptism be an emblem of a spiritual washing, (which the Doctor cannot deny, without flying in the face of GoD's word;) and if that spiritual washing be represented in scripture as the cause of our justification, or indeed the thing itself: then baptism, by the most fair and inevitable consequence, is an emblematical representation of our justification: which is a refutation of the first part of the Doctor's false position. But the spiritual washing of the conscience in justification is represented under the term sprinkling: therefore, if that term be applicable to the thing fignified, by every law of scripture analogy, it is applicable to the fign, and points out the analogous mode of administering it: which was the second point to be proved.

(5) And now, that I may convince the Doctor, that my reasoning on this head is not altogether singular; but that it stands supported by the testimony of some very great men: And that I may at once expose the novelty and sutility of all his boasted objections, I will present him with a few venerable names, whose authority is unqueftionably as great as that of any or all the Anabaptists in the world. I shall begin with CALVIN; whom Dr. Featly calls "the bright burning ta-" per of Geneva." Speaking of baptism as an emblematical representation of our justification, he fays; "In the water, as in a glass, "CHRIST REPRESENTS TO US HIS BLOOD, "that we may feek our purification from it: " and fince he teaches us, that we are formed " again by his Spirit, that being dead unto fin, " we should live unto righteousness; it is certain " that we want nothing which can make for " the substance of baptism." t-Next to Calvin I bring the testimony of BEZA; "The main " thing, or res ipsa the very thing in baptism, is " the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus "CHRIST for the remission of fins and imputa-"tion of his righteousness; which are as it were " fet forth before our eyes EXTERNÆ ASPER-" sionis signo by the sign of outward sprin-"KLING" in baptism. † TILENUS is equally firong and express in favor of the emblematical representation. "- The analogy of the facra-

And again .- " Our inward wash-" ing from fin by the blood and Spirit of CHRIST " is clearly fignified and furely fealed to us" in baptifm.—And still more particularly: " Why " did Jesus command this facrament (of bap-" tisin) to be performed by water washing away " the filth of the body? Because there is analogia " an ANALOGY between the outward washing " with WATER, and the inward cleanfing by the " BLOOD and Spirit of CHRIST." T-To the above testimonies permit me to add that of Dr. LIGHTFOOT. " To denote this washing by a " facramental fign, a sprinkling of water is As " sufficient as an immersion; since the one

From the unanimous testimony of these respectable Critics, it must at first sight appear evident to any reader, that they concur in establishing the sentiment which Dr. S. treats with much contempt; and in establishing it too on scripture-grounds. So that, according to them, it is plain, (1) That baptism is an emblem of spiritual washing by the blood of Christ; and consequently, of our justification. (2) That there is not only an analogy between the external washing with water, and the internal purification of the heart by the blood of Christ, in general; but that this analogy subsists between this internal purification and baptismal Aspersion, in particular. (3) And therefore that sprinkling, thus sounded on fcripture-analogy is a very fignificant mode of administering baptism; because it exhibits an emblematical representation of our justification by the blood of CHRIST. (4) That the application of this analogy to baptifin is not only warranted by scripture, but is farther authenticated by the concurrent opinions of fuch venerable names, as those of, Calvin, Beza, Tilenus, Vossius; Lightfoot, Keckerman, and Walaus .- With fuch respectable authorities to countenance our sentiments, we feel but fmall discomposure at the opposition of Dr. S. or any other Anabaptist in the world. And I fancy there is no occasion to advertise the pious reader, that some at least of those, whose names I have produced, were as likely to know the mind of the Holy Ghoft in his word; to understand the doctrine of scriptureanalogy; and to fix the laws of facred criticism, as all the Anabaptists that ever lived: and therefore, that their evidence gives fuch a fanction to the analogy in debate, as will not leave the reader to hefitate for a moment, on which fide of the question to give his sentence of approbation.

II. The fame mode of reasoning, by which we maintain the scriptural propriety of baptizing by aspersion, drawn from the analogy it bears to our justification by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ, is equally forcible, when applied to the scripture-representations of our renewal by his spirit. Or, in other words; as we ground the validity of baptismal aspersion on the phrases—

the blood of SPRINKLING—WASHED in his blood—it CLEANSETH from all fin, &c.—on the application of a fimilar phraseology to the purifications under the law; on the manifest convertibility of the terms sprinkling, cleansing, washing; and on the natural and well-supported analogy between the baptismal sign and the thing signified: it so we affert, that as the influences of the Spirit are promised in the terms of "sprinkling clean water;" and as baptism is a sign of those influences, and an emblematical representation of their cleansing effect; therefore the mode of administering baptism by sprinkling is farther supported by this superadded analogy.—But let us see what Dr. S. has to say against this.

I Upon that text "I will sprinkle clean water "upon you, and ye shall be clean," Ezek. xxxvi. 25; he says, p. 122. "The leper might be sprinkled, "and thereupon pronounced clean." But the leper not only "might be" but actually was sprinkled, and pronounced actually clean.* And if a leper was legally cleansed by sprinkling; why may not a person be sacramentally cleansed by a cor-[†] N. B. That there is fuch an analogy, Mr. M. himfelf acknowledges in page 20, in the following words. "Baptifin is a LIVELY emblem of "INWARD WASHING."

[&]quot; And he (the prieft) shall sprinkle upon him that is to be "cleanfed from the leprofy, seven times, and shall pronounce him "clean." Levit. xiv. 7. This was the main part of the leper's purification. The washing of his sless, subsequent upon that, was preparatory to his introduction to the camp, and to his tent. And, whereas the Doctor supposes, that this washing was by immersion, he should remember that the Hebrew word used ver. 9, is not tebel; and therefore that this washing was not specifically by dipping, much less a dipping of the whole body.

respondent mode in baptism? As the leper's purification was not suspended on the quantity of the blood: fo neither does the reality of baptism depend on that circumstance, in the application of water. And the validity of the institution in the one case, fully vindicates the sacramental validity in the other .- But against this he argues, "The prophet might fay in reference to " that ceremony, I will sprinkle clean water, &c." But this is an egregious blunder; and I can no otherwife account for the Doctor's making it, than upon a supposition, that either he was ignorant of the proper reference of the above text: or, which is not improbable, that he was unwilling to point it out; because it would effectually overturn all his labored arguments against us. Nor can I better obviate the abfurdity of his reference, than by taking up his own words, " It is to be remembered, that the leper was not " fprinkled with clean water, but with blood." Besides, how can the Doctor possibly suppose the prophet to make any allusion to the legal purisication by blood? when the cleanfing promifed in Ezekiel, is to be effected by clean water? and when this very gentleman's principal argument against our analogy, drawn from the cleanfing the leper by fprinkling of blood to a correspondent mode of administering the baptismal water, is founded on the difference of the matter of these respective inflitutions? If indeed there were no mode of purification by the fprinkling of water under the law, his reference might carry fome air of plaufibility, fibility. But this is not the case. A remarkable mode of this nature is recorded in Num. viii. 6, 7. "Take the Levites from among the children of "Israel, and cleanse them. And thus that thou "do unto them to cleanse them: Sprinkle "water of purifying upon them; and let them "shave all their flesh; and let them wash all "their clothes; and so make themselves clean."

However the garments of the Levites were to have been cleanfed, it is undeniably plain, that in the prefent instance, the purification of their persons was to be effected through the sprinkling of water. A mode this, repeatedly enjoined in Num. xix. If any person touched a dead body and did not purify himself, according to the divine institution; that person was to be cut off from Ifrael: the reason of which severe procedure is mentioned in Ver. 13. "That foul thall " be cut off from Ifrael, because the water of sepa-" ration was not SPRINKLED upon him." And fo very firict and circumftantial was this mode of purification to have been; that not only the person, defiled by the touch of a dead body, but also the tent, all the vessels, and all the persons prefent, were to undergo a general cleanfing; which was to be performed thus. " For an unclean per-" fon they shall take of the ashes of the burnt " heifer of purification for fin, and running wa-" ter shall be put thereto in a vessel: and a clean " person shall take hyssop, and dip it in the water, " and SPRINKLE it upon the tent, and upon all "the vessels," &c. Ver. 17, 18. And of those who neglected neglected this mode of purification, it is again faid, "That foul thall be cut off from among the "congregation because he hath defiled the sanc-"tuary of the LORD; the water of separation hath "not been SPRINKLED upon him." Ver. 20. +

Now that this sprinkling of the water of purification was a legal baptism or washing, appears evident from the reference of the Son of Syrach to this very mode of purification, and from his application of the word Config. "He that is washed " o Configuration of the word Configuration." He that is baptized, "after touching of a dead body and toucheth it "again; what availeth his washing?" Ecclus. xxiv. 26.—The touching of a dead body is the particular defilement mentioned in Num. xix. The mode of purification enjoined was by sprinkling of water. But this sprinkling, an apocryphal writer calls a being baptized. Therefore a legal sprinkling was a baptism; and so may an evangelical one.

It is manifestly therefore in reference to this mode of purification, that the LORD says by Ezekiel, "I will SPRINKLE clean water upon you, "and ye shall be clean." And because the legal

[†] The circumstances of this very mode of purification under the law, are urged by Crprian in his letter to Magnus, in order to demonstrate the validity of baptismal sprinkling. And the very scriptures I have refered to, are quoted in that samous Cyprianic epistle.—" Item in Numeris, & homo qui fuerit immundus usque ad vesperam, hic purissipulur die tertio, &c. si autem non suerit purissicatus, exterminabitur anima illa de Israel, quoniam aqua aspersionis non est super eum sparsa. Et iterum, Dominus ad Moysen, dicens, Accipe Levitas, & purissicationes; & ita facies eis purissicationem, circumspararges eos aqua purissicationis; & iterum, aqua aspersionis purissicatio est." Epist lxxvi. P. 250.

ceremony was typical of an evangelical purification; therefore the spiritual meaning of the one is transfered to the blessings of the other. And, as baptism is a lively symbol of the influences of the Spirit, operating in our fanctification; and as a purification under the law, and a cleansing under the gospel, are both represented under the term sprinkling of water; the inferential argument is, that a baptismal aspersion, being a correspondent emblem of both, is therefore valid, by the force of a double analogy. Nor has Dr. S. urged a single observation, capable of invalidating this analogical inference. Rather, all that he has objected to it, is either plausible evasion, or mere ipse dixit.

And that our analogical reasoning here has the sanction of orthodox antiquity, there is no need to inform the reader, when he recollects the venerable authorities I have already laid before him, respecting the analogy between the sprinkling of the blood of Christ and baptismal aspersion.* For, the testimonies, which authenticate in that case, are equally conclusive in this. However, it may not be amiss to quote a few, immediately applicable to the present analogy.—Cyprian quotes the very passage on which we ground the analogy, and applies it to baptism. "Let no one think it strange, that the sick, "when they are baptized, have water only poured or sprinkled on them; since the Scrip-"ture says by the prophet Ezek. xxxvi. 25; I

" will SPRINKLE clean water, &c." TILENUS is of the fame opinion respecting baptism, as an emblem of the inward wathing of regeneration. "There are here (in baptifin) especially propos-" ed to us, the remission of fins by the blood of " CHRIST, and our fanclification by his Spi-" rit." This testimony of Tilenus is the more valuable, inafmuch as it establishes the two-fold emblem, on which we ground our analogical reasoning. - PETER MARTYR no less corroboraces the propriety of the emblematical reprefentation. Speaking of baptifin as the fymbol of our inward purification by the blood and Spirit of CHRIST, he adds, "But this purification, " whether we be dipt, or have water poured or " sprinkled on us, or by whatever mode we " are washed with water, is most appositely repre-"fented in baptism." +

Once more, therefore, I call upon the judicious reader to weigh, in the ballance of candor, these and the preceding testimonies, against the objections of Dr. S. and the cavils of Mr. M. And I leave him to determine, on which side truth is most likely to preponderate. Had we neither scripture nor antiquity to countenance our fentiments; they might, in that case, be equally fuspected of error and novelty. But, when it be confidered, that a purification under the law, was effected by a SPRINKLING, and a sprinkling of WATER too (a circumstance which repels the force of Dr. S.'s capital objections to one branch of our analogy, founded on the difference in matter, between the element in baptism, and that used in some legal purifications);----that an infpired prophet makes a manifest allusion to that mode of purification, as figurative of our inward cleanfing by the Spirit of CHRIST; --- That the allusive promise in Ezekiel is quoted by Cyprian, and applied to a vindication of the mode of baptifinal afperfion; -that the analogy is farther fupported by the correspondent sentiments of Tilenus and Peter Martyr; as well as by the unanimous authority of those venerable names I mentioned before; - I fay, these things considered, I leave the reader to judge, whether scripture, antiquity, reason, and facred criticism do not unite, in confirming the validity of administering baptism by SPRINKLING as an "emblematical representa-"tion" of our justification by the BLOOD, and of our fanctification, by the SPIRIT of CHRIST?

III. Nor is the force of this reasoning weakened, or the natural inference from it invalidated, by Dr. S.'s criticism on the use of the word New, in p. 125. For, although it is not denied, that the application of that word in some instances supposes an immersion; yet it cannot possibly admit of that signification in every use of it; unless the Doctor will maintain the absurdity of supposing, that a thing can never be washed, unless it be immerged. Besides, it ought to be remembered, that the strictness of the mode of ordinary washing is not to be made the standard of facramental purification; because, if immersion had been effential to washing or cleanfing, in a facramental point of view; in order to preserve an exact fimilarity, all the purifications under the law, both by blood and water, should have been performed by a total plunging in the facramentary element. And the phraseology of scripture-allusions should have been couched in terms, correspondent with the unalterable strictness of the mode. So that, wherever mention was made of any washings, cleansings, or purifications, whether legal or evangelical, dipping ought to have been the invariable term. And fo, according to the fentiments of Anabaptists, the words sprinkling, pouring, &c. ought to have no place in the Bible. When therefore Dr. S. is infifting on immersion as "necessarily" requisite to ordinary washing, I wish he would recollect the judicious observation of Cyprian; ALITER pectus credentis abluitur. The breast of a believer is washed in a different manner. Nothing, therefore, can be more futile or fallacious, than than that kind of reasoning which concludes absolutely from the usage of things human, to divine institutions.

In order to overturn the Doctor's inference from his supposed use of the word \(\lambda\)\(\omega\). I would observe, (1) That if a thing or person may be said faid to be cleanfed as an effect of washing; then if that is called a cleansing, which is performed only by sprinkling, an aspersion may be properly styled a washing. But, we have already seen, in that remarkable case mentioned in Num. viii. and chap. xix; that a man defiled was cleansed by the SPRINKLING of the water of separation; conse-he was washed by it. From whence it is plain, that a facramental purification performed by fprinkling, is, according to fcripture, a facramental washing. And the argument, therefore, which the Doctor would draw from the term " washing of regeneration," retorts on himself; when it is confidered, that the work of regeneration is manifestly represented under the phrases of "the SPRINKLING of clean water," and the " blood of SPRINKLING." And I hope he will acknowledge that when a regenerate finner is faid to be sprinkled with water, (the emblem of the Spirit,) and with the blood of CHRIST, he may also be faid to be washed in both. Otherwife, according to the Doctor's idea there might be supposed some incompleteness in our Spiritual purification. (2) The application of the word λεω in scripture, proves, that the idea of immersion is not necessarily implied in it. CHRIST is said Rev. i. 5, to have washed us Azoans in his blood. But furely it would be extremely abfurd, to argue from hence, that an immersion in his blood necessarily entered into the idea of our spiritual cleansing; especially when it is remembered, that the purifications by typical blood under the law were effeeled fected by sprinkling; and that our antitypical purification by the Redeemer's blood is almost always mentioned under that term. (3) It is faid in Acts xvi. 33, that the converted jailor took Paul and Silas and " washed their siripes," Exergi But it would be abfurd to suppose, that either their persons were totally immerged, or their stripes dipt, in the process of this washing. It is rather probable, that the jailor poured fome water, or fome medicinal fluid on the apostles' stripes; and that this was the mode of washing on that occafion. Yet the word is NEW. (4) The LORD commanded Moses to make a laver of brass Assuper Yahrs for the priests to wash thereat. But how was this washing to be performed? By a total immerfion? No: for they were commanded only to wath their feet and hands. But were not thefe dipt? No: for they were to be washed not eig in, but & av/s out of it. Fiftulas multas habebat. (fays Poole, in his Synopsis in Loc.) per quas emittebatur aqua: It had several PIPES, by which the water was let out. So that, howfoever a total washing by immersion might have been enjoined on other occasions, it is manifest, that in the present case, the priests were washed in the laver (Asing, from hea,) without any immersion at all. (5) Dr. S. quotes Hedericus's Lexicon, as giving us the following etymology of the word. " Azw lavo, & quidem proprie corpus." † But the lexicographer does not mean, as the Doctor would infinuate, that the Greek word, and the correspondent Latin lave, fignify to wash the whole body specifically; but to wash the body or any part of it, in contradistinction to the mode of washing garments. And with this natural interpretation agrees the apposite observation of Athanasius, Has yaz anæθαρτω ελεξο υδαζι, επλυνέζο δε τα ίμαζια. Every unclean person was WASHED with water, but his garments were PLUNGED. * Here is a manifest distinction, founded on the dictinct fignification of two Greek words, differently applied, between the modes of washing unclean persons and their garments. As the former were washed by various modes, of which we have alreeady feen that sprinkling was one; Athanasius uses 1800 as a word of latitude, to comprehend those several modes. But as the garments were plunged, he uses πλυνω, a word of determinate fignification: a plain proof this, that Athanasius did by no means restrict the idea of plunging to Asa, but the more general one of washing; and that he fupposed that Greek word might be used even in contradiffinction to plunging. Whose opinion, therefore, is the more decisive, that of Athananasius or Dr. S. I fancy the reader will easily determine. (6) He intimates that λεω and βαπλιζω are used promiscuously, the one for the other, p. 125. But, if the one fignifies to wash without necessarily implying an immersion, as has already been proved; fo must the other. And a fingle instance, if such could be produced, where either fignified to wash by dipping, would avail nothing, unless it could be demonstrated, that it never included any other fignification. But to prove that this is not the case, let us hear the criticism of PARÆUS: "Baptism among the Greeks is ANY " KIND of wathing or cleanfing, whether it be " performed by immersion or sprinkling." * (7) I shall close this part of the subject with a remarkable passage from Justin Martyr. Having, among other arguments, alleged that fcripture WASH ye, make you clean, as a ground for keeping up an emblematical representation of the great truth it contains, by a baptismal washing; he declares, that the very heathens to Aslpov ansocialis having heard of this wathing in baptism, introduced a representation of it into their ritual. For, fays he, their dæmons "made it a custom, " that all their worshipers, when they approach-" ed their temples, were about to address their " prayers, or to offer facrifices, should possition " saules SPRINKLE themselves." Consonant with which reference of Justin Martyr to the rites of the heathens is the observation of Gulielmus Durantus. "And it is to be noted, that the heathens " or gentiles used to build their temples round " springs, or at least had always water in them " (their temples) by the SPRINKLING of which

be per cujus ASPERSIONEM they believed they were purified: and fo they made a figurative re-" ference to baptism." + From hence it evidently appears that aspersion of water was a mode of purification among the heathens; that they borrowed this practice from the christians; and confequently that baptifmal fprinkling is authenticated by the usage of primitive christianity. So that what the heathens practifed by sprinkling water of purification, Justin Martyr calls Aslgov a washing: But if to this it should be objected, that probably he meant to blame the heathens' mode of purification as a piece of mimicry, or an abuse of baptismal washing; such an objection is effectually precluded by confidering the very intent of the apologist. For as Justin was presenting an apology for the rites of his brethren, of which baptism was one; he furely could never have supported this branch of his apology, if the christians had always practifed immersion, when fprinkling was the ceremony among the heathens. For how could he make the practice of aspersion a fufficient justification of fo contrary a mode as that of dipping? The baptifinal washing, therefore, which the heathens heard of from the chriftians, Justin calls as gov. But the heathens kept up an imitation of this washing by sprinkling of water; and from this circumstance of similarity, the apologist justified the practice of his bre-

IV. I am now naturally brought, from the connexion which one part of the subject has with another, to confider the divers washings or diapopois Caπ μσμοις different baptisms mentioned in Heb. ix. 10. These washings under the law, were executed by various modes of applying water, sprinkling not excluded. And, as the apostle calls these several modes of purification, baptisms; we therefore argue, from this various use of the term, that an application of the facramental water by pouring or sprinkling, is, according to the language of inspiration itself, a valid baptism. Against this Mr. M. does not even attempt to urge a fingle argument: he only fays, that "he does not re-" member that the Mosaic sprinklings are called " washings." But, I am of opinion that his candor fails here, rather than his memory. However that I may whet the latter a little, I would ask him, if he remembers, that the mode of purification enjoined to one under a legal pollution, was to be performed by a "fprinkling the water of fepa-" ration" upon him; and that the person thus sprinkled was faid to be made clean. Is not that therefore a mode of washing, which is manifestly a mode of cleansing? I ask him too if he remembers, that upon the sprinkling of blood on the leper seven times (a circumstance implying perfect purification) he was "pronounced clean?" And, as this was antecedent to the washing his body with water and therefore apparently the leading part in the ceremony; whether it was not confequently the principal circumstance in his legal washing? I ask him farther, in additional confirmation of the propriety of calling sprinkling a fcriptural mode of washing, if he remembers, that what St. John styles being "washed and cleansed" by the blood of CHRIST, St. Paul terms " having "the heart sprinkled?" If therefore the Holy Ghost, in his word, calls that in one place washing or cleanfing, which in another, he flyles sprinkling; I ask, whether he remembers that evangelical sprinklings are called washings and vice versa? and whether these convertible terms in the New Testament do not bear a manifest reference to the accommodation of them under the Old? If a person, therefore, who is sprinkled, with the blood of CHRIST, is also said in scripture to be washed in it; why may not one who is sprinkled in baptism, as emblematical of his spiritual purification, be also said to be washed with the facramental water, and therefore to be partaker of a valid baptism? If sprinkling is called washing in the thing fignified; why not in the fign? A natural inference this, founded on scripture-analogy; and against which, I defy Mr. M. to advance any thing that has the least appearance of argument.

Indeed he feems fo fully conscious, that his own abilities are infufficient to combat with our reafoning on this head, that, he very honeftly refers us to his oracle Dr. S. whose defence, of the criticifm ticism on Heb. ix. 10, is therefore to be esteemed a supply for Mr. M.'s lack of service. Indeed, when I reslect on our author's notorious desiciency in the critical department, and his manifest disqualification for controversy altogether; I am surprised he did not resign up the principal management of the present dispute to some-body else; and thus sight by proxy, rather than expose his weakness in propriâ personâ. According therefore to his reservece, I turn from the saint echo to the oracle.

Dr. S. fets out with faying, p. 54. "We insist "that the proper meaning of the word Confloquest" is bathings or dippings." And so, after begging the question in this insisting style, he proceeds to prove, that "the various plungings of priests, " levites and people, for defilement, &c. are the " different species of the genus dippings." Thus, according to the Doctor, dippings are the different fpecies of the genus dippings. And whether this is not a species of that kind of nonsense and glaring embarraffment, which attends his reasoning on this head, I leave the reader to judge. Small as my acquaintance is with the doctrine of genus and species, yet I know there is between the several species contained in the genus, what logicians call differentia. Thus a man and a brute are different species of the genus animal; and that which constitutes the difference between these species is rationality. But where is the logical differentia between plungings and dippings? unless the Doctor will contend that a variation in terms makes it. Indeed Indeed he feemed aware that to affirm, dippings are species of dippings, would incur manifest abfurdity, and therefore he artfully varied his phraseology. But such little artifices as these are easily feen through, and help to detect the fallacy and evafion which frequently lurk under them. But the Doctor makes his difference between the species and genus, to confist in the variety of the persons to be plunged. He says, the priests were dipped, the levites dipped, and the people dipped. So that it is all dipping still without any difference. He quotes Spencer and Grotius, as faying there was "one washing of the priests, " another of the Levites, and another of the peo-" ple." And what then? Who denies that? But does the Doctor consider that the difference implied in διωφοροίς respects not the persons, but Confloring the modes or species of washing. Had the Greek word been Toldoug divers in number, the Doctor might have established his favorite interpretation. But the word the apostle uses, fignifies a diversity in kind. Whereas that diversity is lost, where we have nothing but dippings and dippings.

Let us fee how he applies his reasoning to the use of the word in Rom. xii. 6. Mention is made there of differing gifts diapopa xaqioquala. And those gifts are specified; such as prophecy, exhortation, ruling, &c. Upon this the Doctor argues thus, "We might with good reason argue anasilogically from this other passage in Romans, and say, that as prophecy, ruling, &c. are the different different species of the genus gifts; so the va-" rious plungings are, &c." But, according to our author's mode of reasoning, the analogy is destroyed, For when he says, p. 55, that the Greek word refers " to the various forts of per-" fons cleanfed;" how can an analogy fubfift between the cleanfing of different persons and the dispensing of different gifts? when the genus and species are manifestly confounded, and the latter does not by a fimilar analogy arise out of the former? If according to the Doctor, διωροροι Can lo uce fignify cleanfing of different persons; then in order to preserve a just analogy, διαφορα yapıv uala ought likewise to mean gifts dispensed to different persons. But the absurdity of inference in the latter case, clearly exposes the fallacy of conclusion in the former. Xagio μαζα gifts are the genus; whose species are, prophecy, ruling, &c. Each of these is a species; each is different from the other; and both are contained in the genus. But according to our author's doctrine of genus and species, if only one of these (prophecy for instance) had been given "to various persons," to the pastors, deacons, people; still χαρισμαία gifts would have been the genus, and one of these gifts confered on various persons, would have been the species: and thus prophecies would have been the species of prophecies, without any difference whatever; for the difference would respect, the persons on whom they were bestowed, and not the things given. See to what uncommon abfurdity the Doctor's reasoning here leads!

Another instance will expose it still more. In Lev. xix. 19, the LORD commands his people not to fow their fields with mingled feed, & nalas meges διαφορον, diverso femine, (Latin. Vulg.) The Greek word is the fame here as in Hebrews and Romans, and fignifies a difference in the species of feed; a mingling of which was prohibited under the law. But, by our author's mode of accommodating the doctrine of genus and species, though the Jews had used one unmingled seed, yet if they deposited it in various fields or upon various "occasions," they would have equally violated the divine injunction; because, although there was not the least difference between the pure seed sown in one piece of ground, and the same deposited in another; yet, according to the Doctor's idea, there would have subsissed a difference between these species of seeds, only because of the different fields to which they had been committed. After the fame abfurd manner, does he reason about the divers baptisms under the law. The priests, he fays, were dipped in water, the Levites were dipped, and the people were dipped. And where is the difference between dipping in water and dipping in water? "O but different persons were dipped!" But how does a difference in the persons constitute a difference in the thing? when the mode of applying the water was the very fame to priests, Levites and people? I need not inform the judicious reader, that the whole of the Doctor's reasoning, which seems perfectly new, amounts to this, viz. that a genus may have different species:

cies; and that there may be no real difference at all between these different species (which is a contradiction in terms) no more than between

How much more natural is our interpretation! That there were purifications by washing under the law; and that the different species of the genus washings confisted in the different modes of purification by sprinkling, dipping, &c. and that therefore fprinklings were a species of those legal baptisms. And with this accords the opinion of the . judicious Poole, in his Annotations in Loc. " Which " (baptisms) were many for the priests in their fer-" vices, and for others in performing theirs by "them; fome by SPRINKLING with blood, " Exod. xxix. 20, 21; with water, Num. viii. 7. " Some by washing at the brazen laver" (which we have before proved not to have been performed by immersion) "as the priests, Exod. xxix. 4, " and xxx. 17-22; fo the SPRINKLING of " healed lepers, Lev. xiv. 4-9; and the purifi-" cation of the unclean." From the testimony of this great commentator, and from my antecedent strictures on the Doctor's analogical reasoning from one genus and species to another, and the visible embarrassment which attends his com-

^{*} Dr. Stennett's Grandfather, in his "Remarks" on Russen, (p. 24), charges his opponent with the absurdity of afferting, that "washing" is the species of the genus washing." But the Granson has adopted a similar absurdity, in maintaining, that "plungings are the species of the genus plungings." And my charge against the Grandson respects the same obvious mistake which the Grandsather noted in Russen. We'll leave the Grandsather and Grandson, therefore, to adjust this matter between them.

ment on Heb. ix. 10. I leave the reader to judge, whether his friend in Liverpool is mistaken or not, when he compliments his oracle by saying, that the absurd "fense" he gives us of the passage, is "well-defended" For my own part, I think all that he has said on the subject is no defence at all; and if to the word sense Mr. M. would superadd that significant monosyllable non, he would certainly form a word, exactly descriptive of the nature of his oracle's criticism; and particularly expressive of that lumber, with which his own elaborate book is overloaded.

V. Having established the validity of administering baptism by sprinkling, from the analogy between that mode and one species of purification under the law; and having resuted the whole of Dr. S.'s criticisms, by an appeal to the common rules of genus and species, as well as to the testimony of a great commentator; I proceed now, to the consideration of a point, the discussion of which, though not of very great importance, will nevertheless assist me in detecting the fallacy and weakness, under which Mr. M. screens some of his boasted arguments.

In p. 34, he prefents us with an elaborate note, which ends no fooner, than in p. 36; and which for delicacy of fentiment, (ironicé loquor) chastity of diction, and force of argument, is quite an original. The fabricator of this elegant note, will I hope, excuse me, if I decline a minute consideration of the interiora of its delicate contents; because I feel equally reluctant to offend my reader's ear with the turpe dictu, or to follow the polite note-maker through the path of indecent illustration.-The whole of the weighty argumentation it is intended to establish, amounts to this; that fince Pædobaptists maintain there is an analogy between circumcifion and baptifm, as to the fubjects, the same analogy should be strictly obferved in an application of the one as well as the other. The fallacy of this pitiable argument confifts in a fupposition, that an analogy cannot be supported, unless there be a strict resemblance in every circumstantial. Suppose we apply this mode of arguing to the analogy which the Anabaptists maintain between a burial and a baptism. In the act of interment, the whole body is at once laid in the earth. But is the ceremony of the dippers exactly correspondent with this circumstance? when the person to be baptized walks into the water, and the administrator buries little more than the head and shoulders in his "watery grave?" Now, according to our curious analogist's reasoning on another occasion, a failure in this fingle circumftance deftroys the analogy between a burial and an immerfion; and, by his own principle, totally invalidates his favorite ceremony; and confequently renders his arguing palpably foolish.—Suppose we transfer this mode of reasoning to the resemblance between the passover and the Lord's supper. That there is a striking analogy, between the emblematical commemoration of the Redeemer's death in the one ordinance and the other, I suppose you will not deny; and

and that therefore we may with propriety call the latter our christian passover. Now, if, because we style baptism our christian circumcision, and under that term imply a refemblance between the old testament rite and its succedaneum under the gospel, you think, we are necessitated, in order to keep up the analogy, to observe a particular circumstance in the mode of application; + otherwife that the refemblance is destroyed: then, according to the fame analogical reasoning, cannot properly receive the LORD's supper, unless with our loins literally girded, a staff in our hand, &c. For if the one ordinance be a succedaneum to the other, and a refemblance cannot be kept up, without an observance of every circumflantial; confequently, the particulars enjoined in the one case, are a standing rule of imitation in the other. So that by the note-maker's analogical nonsense, all the facraments are equally invalidated. -Again. The Anabaptists argue analogically from the washings under the law to the propriety of immersion in baptism. But according to our author's mode of flating analogies, if he would keep up a strict resemblance, between the one and the other, which the failure in a fingle circumstance would destroy; then his candidates ought to have water of purifying sprinkled on them,

[†] If the opinion of a fensible and pious writer can have any weight with the author of a certain immodest note, I beg leave to present him with the following. " It is sufficient, that the head be sprinkled, or have " water poured on it, or, as being the principal part, if it be dipped. " Sufficit quod caput aspergatur, vel super caput aqua effundatur, vel in aquam " mergatur, tanquam pars principalior .- Lynwood. Constitu. L. iii. De " Baptismo."

to wash their flesh, to shave all their flesh, to wash their cloathes, &c. For these were concomitant circumstances inseparably connected with the legal washings. But that the dippers will not chuse to extend their analogical reasoning thus far (which however they ought to do according to our analogist) I fancy there is little fear.

But that I may as foon as possible dismiss a fubject, which leads to fuch endless trifling, I would observe, that if analogies cannot subfift, unless there be a precise resemblance in every punctilio, and a literal correspondence in every circumflantial (which is the doctrine of the notemaker;) there is not then, according to him, a fair analogy to be met with, perhaps in the whole Bible: and the fame mode of analogizing would equally invalidate the correspondence between types and their antitypes. For, as it would be impossible to find an instance, where the one anfwered to the other, in universal refemblance; confequently, the typical analogy must be destroyed. And fo, if a person were to draw inferences respecting the types, as Mr. M. has argued, or rather blundered about baptismal sprinkling, he might argue, that the first Adam was not a type of the fecond, because, though there was a striking correspondence between them in some particulars, yet there was not an analogy in all.

So much for the decent note and the mighty arguments it contains. As Mr. M. informs us that "he is obliged to a friend" for another in the fame elaborate style, p. 30, it is not improbable that he is under a fimilar obligation to the fame note-making "friend" for that we have been just canvassing. If so; what a pity! he did not favor us with the name of the gentleman, to whom he acknowledges himself so prodigiously indebted! Then myfelf and the public might have united in transmitting our joint thanks to Mr. M.'s note-making auxiliary, for favoring us with fuch an elegant compound of decency and argumentation, through the convenient channel of his pamphlet. However, as it feems not quite clear, whether the aforefaid note originated from Wrexham or Liverpool; 'till a future publication afcertains its origin, let these two places mutually contend with each other for the honor of producing fuch a birth; like the cities that disputed their respective claims to the nativity of Homer. And as foon as the point of moment is determined, and it is made manifest, to whom the public are under fuch vast obligations, whether to Mr. 7. or Mr. M. let the spot, where such important notes are fabricated, be deemed peculiarly facred for prodigies; and let the fabricator himself, qui miscuit utile dulci, receive the merited palm as note-maker general.

C H A P. VI.

His arguments in favor of immersion, taken from the superstitious washings of the Pharisees and all the Jews, invalidated.—Beza, Dr. Pocock and Wall, unite in supposing that to be only a washing of the hands, which the apostle calls a being baptized.
—The application of the word Earlie to the bloody baptism of Christ, and to the baptism in the cloud, &c. not necessarily including the idea of immersion.—Examples of baptisms in scripture considered.—The note-maker's translation of a passage from Witsius, and his indirect charge against us of blasphemous reasoning, stript of the coloring of falshood, chicanery, and sophistry.

monstrate the absurdity of making immersion effential to the mode of administering baptism, not a few are taken from the various use and extensive application of the Greek word carlico. That this word has not the confined signification, which Anabaptists assix to it, I intimated in a quotation from Leigh's Critica Sacra. But as Mr. M. has infinuated that I have quoted that author neither "fairly" nor "honestly;" I will present the reader with that part of the lexicographer's opinion, which immediately follows the passage I quoted from him in my Letter, p. 17.—"Christ" no where requireth dipping, but only baptizing:

" which word (as Hesychius, Stephanus, Scapula and Budæus the great masters of the Greek tongue, make good by very many inflances and allegations out of classic writers) importeth no more than ablution or washing. Earliew (fay they in their " Lexicons and Commentaries) lavo; வேரிமும lavatio, ablutio; which may be done without "dipping."--It is true, after this there follow the opinions of feveral other authors, one of which Mr. M. produces, as a contrast to mine. therefore the passage I quoted, is found in Leigh as well as that which favors Mr. M.'s idea of dipping; have I not exactly an equal cause to bring the charge of "dishonest" and "unfair" quotation against him? especially as he mangles the lexicographer much more than I have done. Besides, the extract I gave the reader from Leigh, I called the author's own "observation." that my quotation contains the lexicographer's own opinion, in preference to those which follow it, feems evident; because it is the first, the longest. and the most particular critique of all the rest. What therefore, but the most glaring want of candor, could induce our author to represent me as acting "dishonestly" in my quotation from Leigh? especially when he imitates the very thing, which he fo indecently reprehends in me? But this is our author's way. He hardly ever omits a fingle opportunity, whether just or otherwise, of abusing us, if a fentiment is dropped that militates with his pre-conceived ideas. Take a remarkable markable fpecimen of his abusive faculty in the following instance.

Among the argumentative witticifms, which were levelled at baptifinal afperfion, in our author's late memorable harangue at Shrewfbury, one was, his appeal to the audience, "whether "the sprinkling their pots and cups would cleanse "them? This wonderful argumentum ad ancillas, which, to be fure, would appear extremely decifive to all the fervants that attended; a judicious hearer faw through; and, in order to weaken the force of an observation, which tended to represent immersion in baptism as more favorable to the idea of inward purification than sprinkling, he retorted the coarse illustration upon him; by observing "that the pots and cups would not " probably be more cleanfed, if wrapt in cloths " and drawn fuddenly through the water, than " if they had been sprinkled." As this was an observation in Mr. M.'s own style, and exactly fuited to his method of reasoning; he therefore fets about attacking it, with full as much ferioufness as Don Quixot encountered the puppets; and the issue of that tremendous rencounter between the ligna mobilia and the romantic hero, is not altogether unlike the overflowings of our author's indignation against a harmless simile; which happens to be nothing more than an exact transcript of a puppet formed in his own brain, and fufpended from his rostrum by the deceptive wire of a little low-lived fophistry. After going all the way to Bath, Southampton, &c. for illustrative artillery artillery (which is all nothing to the purpose, unless it was the custom for those who bathed in vestments at those places, just to pop under water, and instantaneously to be taken out again;) he then makes a sudden transition to the Dunciad. Having ranfacked that inexhaustible fund of fatire, for fomething adapted to the fwellings of his indignation, he at last lights upon two lines, as he thinks, full to his purpose. With this borrowed distich he fallies forth, as with a formidable weapon; and with two fevere blows, brings a charge of dulness and pertness; intended for my friend or me; perhaps for both. How great are our obligations to this modest gentleman for honoring us with a place in the dunciad, I will not mention; and I have no reason to be greatly chagrined at the coarse compliment, when I confider that I am not alone in its application. For. you know, reader,

Were I disposed to observe the lex talionis, how easily might I accost this ransacker of the dunciad with a retaliating quotation from Hudibras!—As to the charge of dulness, I feel quite indisposed to vindicate myself. But though I decline the task of vindication in favor of "the Vicar;" that is no reason why I may not vindicate his friend. I assure thee, then, reader, the double charge of dulness and pertness no more suits him, than a panegyric on modesty and politeness, would decypher the Anabaptist champion of Liverpools.

Liverpool. The friend I allude to, is not one whit inferior to Mr. M. in judiciousness; at the same time that he is much his superior in genuine piety. And if his observation on Mr. M's vulgarism merits the appellation of "pertness;" let it be remembered, that it was only pertness in private conversation. Whereas Mr. M's was "pertness" from the pulpit; "pertness" in a solemn ordinance; "pertness" before a numerous congregation; "pertness" devoid of decency and argument; and "pertness" that affected the practice of a body of ministers, numbers of whom are as much above him in point of learning and piety, as he is beneath them by the vulgarity and petulance of his conduct. And howsoever Mr. M. might think the charge of dulness is applicable to me; I assure him, I am not so dull but I can see the very striking accommodation of the following lines to his style of writing.

I am extremely forry to divert the reader from the principal subject in debate, by drawing off his attention for a moment to the abusive digressions of Mr. M. But, where such rubbish lies in our way, it is sometimes necessary to remove it; although the task is very unpleasing, I must own. Without digressing any more for the present, I will proceed to consider the applications of the word Lampica in scripture: and I doubt in the examination of these passages with Mr. M.'s curious strictures on them, it will be difficult to determine, whether his criticisms or invectives contain the more real rubbish, either for quantity or quality.

The Greek word adapted in scripture to express the ordinance of baptism, is applied in several other instances, where the idea of immersion is not implied; consequently that idea cannot be always transfered to a fixed mode of baptism by

I. "The pharifees and all the Jews except they " wash their hands oft, eat not; and when they " come from market, except they wash (Gan 100 w) as " baptize themselves) they eat not." Mark vii. 3, 4. Upon this passage he observes, p. 19; " So strict a fect as the pharifees would have "made but little of the inconveniency" of im-mersion every day before dinner. But I fancy ALL THE JEWS would not "have made but " little" of this inconveniency. For observe, reader, the Apostle says, that not only the pharisees but likewise "ALL the Jews" washed before dinner. That therefore an immersion-of the whole body-every day before dinner-was practicable for all the Jews as well as for all the pharifees, I fancy a person of unbounded credulity will hardly suppose; without admitting the equally incredible hypothesis that this universal immerfion must have been carried on by uninterrupted miracle. But it is plain that the washing which the Apostle says all the Jews practised, was nothing more than that of their hands: for, in the E e 2

werfe immediately preceding the passage I have just quoted from Mark vii. the apostle informs us that what the pharifees blamed the disciples for, was their eating bread with x spo w arealois unwashen hands; and their question in ver. 5, is founded on the fame circumstance and couched in the very fame words, "Why walk not thy disciples "according to the tradition of the elders, but " eat bread with avialois x spoir unwashen hands?" Now if the thing which the pharifees blamed in the disciples was a not washing their hands; was not that the very thing which they practifed themselves? To blame the disciples for not washing their hands when their own custom was a bathing of the whole body, would have been ridiculoufly inconfistent. And yet this unavoidable abfurdity attends the criticisms of Anabaptists on this passage. However, to put the question be-yond dispute, let us consider that apposite pasfage in Luke xi. 38. A pharifee having invited our LORD to dine with him "marvelled that he thad not first washed & πρωτον εβαπλιθη was not " first baptized before dinner." Now compare this text with Matth. xv. 2, 20, and with Mark vii. 2, 4, 5, and you will find in these parallel pasfages, that all the pharifees expected of our LORD or his difciples was, that they should have washed their hands. Yet this was called a being baptized. So that from hence it is plain, a partial washing is according to scripture a baptism of the person. And indeed Mr. M. himself seems aware of the force of this most evident demonstration; and endeavors to evade it by a concession, which for his fide of the question happens to be rather unfortunate. " Suppose they did not (dip their " whole bodies), still they dipped that part they " did wash; and all that we are contending for, is " that Carlico fignifies to dip." Is this indeed " ALL THAT HE IS CONTENDING FOR?" Then from this day forward, Mr. M. should never more. " contend" for a total immersion as essential to baptism. Because, if our LORD and his disciples were faid to be baptized, when they only washed their hands; and "all that" our author "contends. " for, is that the Greek word fignifies to dip;" then fupposing even that they dipt their hands. in order to wash them (which I will prove not to have been the case), according to Mr. M. himfelf, a dipping of a part is a baptism of the whole man: according to the celebrated maxim of Dr. Gale, "What is true of ANY ONE part separately, is true of the WHOLE complexly." And so, here. our two Anabaptists unite in giving up a total immersion as essential to baptism, and in establishing a partial washing, as equally valid. And, in order to keep our author in his present sentiments, as well as to convince him that others have commented on the washings of the pharifees, as we have done, I beg he would confider. the following opinion of Tilenus. " Baptism, if we " respect the etymology of the word, fignifies dip-" ping, and likewise SPRINKLING, in which sense it is used, Mar. vii. 4; and consequently wash-" ing." And again. " Baptism in general fig-" nifies.

"nifies, immersion, or washing, or SPRINKLING." From this apposite note of the etymologist Tilenus, which I beg our author to ruminate upon, I pass to his Next argument, fuch as it is. He contends that the manner the pharifees washed their hands was by immersion. And supposing we grant that, it is not very material; fince it would not invalidate the argument against the necessity of a total immersion in baptism. However there is intimation in scripture that the Jews washed their hands by pouring water on them: for it is written, that Elisha poured water on the hands of Elijah." Dr. Gale indeed, and from him Dr. Stennett, fay, it should be, "FOR the hands of Elijah;" contrary to the Latin super and the feptuagint Greek, which renders it 'υπερ χειρας. Besides, Dr. Wall, in p. 109, and 111, of his Defence, quotes the learned Dr. Pocock, as proving from Maimonides and other Rabbis, that the ordinary mode of wathing hands before meals, was by water running or poured out of a vessel or small cistern, called by Eustathius x sepuloov, and by the Evangelist भगः । from which the water ran out by a cock for that purpose; of which there feems to be an intimation in that expression 'υδως επι ποδας με, Luke vii. 44.

In order to justify his translating the Greek word in Mark vii. 4, bathe, Dr. S. quotes Beza as favoring his interpretation. But the very fame Beza, howfoever on that passage he drop a criticism that countenances the Doctor's sentiment, gives us an interpretation of the same word ban icu, which directly militates with the Doctor's idea. This is evident from the following words of Dr. Wall. " Dr. Pocock both fays himself, and quotes " Beza SAYING THE SAME, that CampiceDan here " in St. Luke, means the fame as \si and " xepreteles, to wash, or to wash the hands. And " that fince that washing of the hands might be done, either by putting them in the water, or by pouring " water on them; there is (in the text of St. Luke) " a word used εβαπιθη which comprehends both the " one and the other." + For, fays the Dr. (Pocock) " that it is not used only for that (dipping) I think " is plain from that which we read in Luke xi. 38. " The pharifee marvelled that & πρω]ον εβαπ]ιβη." Not. Miscell. C. ix. P. 397.

So that from hence it follows, (1) that Beza's opinion respecting Mark vii, 4, does not altogether suit the Doctor's purpose; since it does not conclude absolutely against us; (2) that Beza's interpretation on one passage, manifestly savors the very arguments we urge respecting the mode of the Jewish washings from another; (3) that Dr. Pocock and Beza were unanimous in calling that a baptism, which was only a washing of the hands; and (+) that Carlico, according to these two great critics, fignifies the fame as hew and xequirra. A proof this, by the bye, they did not think as Dr. S. does, that hew always implies the idea of washing the whole body.

II. The fecond application of the word respects their manner of washing their cups, pots, brazeń veffels and xanw beds or tables. On this branch of the Jewish washings Mr. M. asks, "Who ever " washed pots or cups without putting them into " water?" This is our author's only argument to prove the Jews always immerfed these articles; even the mention of which is sufficient to its refutation. As to the cups, there is an intimation in fcripture that contradicts the supposition of their having been overwhelmed; for our LORD charges the pharifees with making clean το 'εξωθεν ποίηριε only the outside of the cup. Matth. i. 23, 25. How therefore only the outfide could be cleanfed, if the whole was immerfed, I leave to our profound disquisitor to determine: for to me it would feem a manœuvre in the washing - way quite paradoxical, if not downright legerdemain. -Whether it is usual to clean pots by plunging them in water, and never by pouring water on them, Mr. M.'s fervant could have told him.-Is it probable that their brazen vessels were ever immerfed? when it is confidered that they were often fo large as to contain a fort of refervoir for the purpose of washing other furniture? Who would think of plunging a furnace into water in order to wash it?—Were their beds washed by immersion? O but Mr. M. thinks the word may may as properly fignify tables. I think not. + Kλινη is derived from κλινω reclino, and is the name of those couches on which they reclined themselves at dinner. Besides it is translated bed in Matth. ix. 2. But supposing it to signify a table, he fays, "Surely there is no difficulty to " put a table into water." As for the difficulty of doing this, it depends principally on the want of depth or convenience of water. How therefore every family among the Jews could be constantly provided with a fufficiency, to plunge their tables in; or why that should be their invariable mode of washing them; appears to me among those huge incredibilities, which common fense cannot digest; and yet which with partyprejudice go down as glib as absolute certain-If Dr. S.'s maxim "that what was most " natural was probably most usual" be just; we need only appeal to modern practice, in order to investigate the most natural mode which the Jews adopted in washing their tables.

But in farther support of his supposition (for proof is no component part of our author's criticisms) that the articles just mentioned were washed by immersion; he says, "Nor would it be any won-"der, if even frequently we are not told how "often," (nay, we are not told it at all that)

[†] Persons baptized in their beds, were called in Latin clinici, a word derived from zhin, a bed. But when our author translates the Greek word a table; then, according to him and his oracle, the clinici were persons baptized on tables.—See what nonsense results from an unwillingness to yield up the most plain interpretation, when it classes with the interests of bigotry!

" they put their beds and couches into water, " especially as the law of Moses enjoined, that " every thing deemed unclean, whether it was a " vessel of wood, or raiment, or skin, or sack, it must be put into water." This illustration, which he borrows from his oracle, is in his opinion decifive. But it happens to be nothing at all to the purpose. For (1) What in the name of wonder has a divine injunction to do with the fuperfitious customs of the Jews; which were a manifest corruption of, yea a departure from, the command of God? For fo our LORD reprefents them, faying, "For, laying aside the com-" mandment of God, ye hold the tradition of "men; as the baptisms of pots, &c." Mark vii. 7, 8.

(2) What God enjoined in Lev. xi. 31, respected the legal defilement of any vessel, &c. by the carcase of a mouse or any other unclean animal falling into it. But the washings practifed by the Jews, were the result of their own superstition: for they feem to have been performed (as it appears from the context) as often as the vessels were to have been used at any meal. (3) If the Jews made any reference in this practice to the command in Leviticus, they still destroyed it by their traditions and superstitions; otherwise our LORD would not have blamed them. And as their washing the outside of the cup, &c. was one of the corruptions he blamed; does not that circumflance imply that they did not plunge them? (4) Besides, we are informed Num. xxxi. 23; that every vessel that would abide the fire, of brass, iron, tin, &c. was to go through the fire and to be purified by the water of separation; which was by SPRINKLING. Chap. vii. 13. So that brazen vessels, pots and cups, were not commanded to be put into the water at all. Here therefore Mr. M. and his oracle argue against themselves; and here I shall leave them in felf-contradictory coalition, for a moment, while I prefent the reader with the opinion of the great Dr. Lightfoot. " word (i. e. δωπ]ισμω) when applied to the " following things" (the cups, pots, &c.) " does " not always fignify dipping or plunging, but " fometimes washing only, or even SPRINKLING, " (as Maimonides observes) especially of the cup of " bleffing." *

III. No fooner does Mr. M. bring the charge of pertness and dulness against my friend and me, than he makes an instantaneous transition from his abusive distich to—the sufferings of Christ. This sudden change from the satire and jocularity of the dunciad to the sad solemnities of Gethsemane; or from the levity of Pope to the bloody baptism of the Son of God; carries with it such a profane mixture of irreverence, and contains such a preposterous blending of the tragi-comic, as I am sure will offend the delicacy of every pious reader. But this is a way quite samiliar to our author. He has acquired fuch an irreverent mode of introducing head-and-shoulders the most folemn subjects after the most trisling witticisms, that the heterogeneous commixture frequently occurs. One most memorable instance of this unhallowed levity foon follows in the very page with the quotation from the dunciad. After faying that the Redeemer's "foul was overwhelmed with " forrow;" in the parenthesis which immediately follows these solemn words, he ushers in a jocular fneer at me for describing the effects of Christ's baptism by the terms "the falling of his blood " in grumous clots to the ground," Thus he feems to sympathize with CHRIST and to laugh at me in one and the same breath. And if I may be allowed to form a parody on a line in Martial, I would fay concerning fuch want of feriousness.

But confider we now our irreverent jester's arguments. He says I have "confined the idea of "Christ's sufferings to the material; blood of "his body." But here our author mistakes and [†] Mr. M. has written the word material in italies, and by so doing has given it a mark of emphasis and discrimination. According to him therefore, it should seem that "material blood" is one particular kind, and immaterial, another. Now, as he blames me for having "confined "the idea of Christ's sufferings to the material" species of his blood; I wish he would tell us what idea he has of the immateriality of that sluid But, as I would hope he is not so prosane as to philosophize, where neither philosophy, divinity, nor common sense will support his distinctions; I would only suggest, that the term material blood is equivalent to material matter, and supposes a distinction of species, where there is none; and therefore incurs material nonsense.

mifrepresents in a breath. When I said that CHRIST was baptized in his blood, I meant that this outward state of his body bedewed with blood, as the effect of the internal fufferings of his foul, fuggested the idea of aspersion. I hopemy view of "the attending agonies of CHRIST" is not a whit more "crampt" than that of Mr. M. himfelf; nor do I think, that any impartial person would suppose I intended "to diminish the great-" nets and weight of the futferings" of his foul, because I labored to paint in proper colors the effect of these sufferings on his body. And though I am not reluctant in acknowledging, that the univerfal agony that feized all the powers of his human foul might very properly fuggest the idea of overwhelming, which the reference to Ps. lxix. 2, naturally illustrates; yet furely it does not militate with this idea, that the state of his body fuggests the distinct idea of aspersion, especially as an inspired prophet accommodates the very term sprinkling to the effect of the Redeemer's fufferings and conquests, alluded to in If. Ixiii. And that I am not fingular in this idea, I will prove from the testimony of three great men.-GREGORY NAZIANZEN fays, "I know also of " a fourth baptism, that of martyrdom and " blood 'ω κ' αυζω Χρις > εβαπίσατο with which " CHRIST himself was baptized." *- The venerable BEDE confirms the idea of aspersion. For, commenting on the very words of CHRIST in Luke xii. 50, he makes him fay, "I have" fays:

he (a baptism to be baptized with, i.e.) "to be "SPRINKLED with the bedewing or dying of my own blood." —Scultetus in his fermon on Is. lxiii, which he intitles Triumphus Dei habitu cruentato ex acie redeuntis; paraphrasing on ver. I says, "To come from Edom is to walk in a red "vestment; and with dyed garments from Bozrah" is to have garments SPRINKLED with new wine. —I have trod the wine-press, that is the grapes in the press. And from hence I wear garments SPRINKLED with the blood of mine ene"ments SPRINKLED with the blood of mine ene"mies." ‡

IV. The next application of the word, where the idea of baptifinal immersion is not necessarily implied, occurs in 1. Cor. x. 2. The account given us of the passage of the children of Israel thro' the Red sea, seems naturally to savor the idea of aspersion. But against this Mr. M. says, that "the Israelites went through the cavity of the sea on dry land;" and therefore they could not have been sprinkled with some detached particles of the sea. What wonderful logic! As if a person may not be sprinkled with rain and walk on dry land at the same time. O but "they "were in the cloud and in the sea; and this surely savors immersion." p. 22. Observe reader, to what sallacy and absurdity the Anabaptist is driven! He fays the Ifraelites went on dry land: he will not allow that they were wet with the dew from the fea or the cloud: and yet he fays they were immersed in both. But the apostle says they were baptized upon this occasion. According therefore to our author, here was a baptifm without any application of WATER. An erroneous criticism this, that would justify the most unjustifiable mode of baptizing. For, if the course of a fiream could be divided or turned from its natural channel by an intervening wall on the right hand and on the left, and a perfon was let down into this artificial aperture or "cavity" of the water; in fuch a fituation, although he should be "on dry land," yet with a cloud over his head, and the waters around him, he might be faid to be in both, and to be baptized in both, without the application of a fingle drop of water. And yet flupidly abfurd and invalid as fuch a mode of baptism would be; it is nevertheless authenticated by Mr. M.'s dry criticism. But that he may learn to criticife a little better on this passage, in future, I beg he would keep in mind the fenfible maxim of Dr. Lightfoot. "The application of WATER is " necessary as to the ESSENCE of baptism: but the application of it by this or the other MODE " expresses the circumstance." †

(according to his uncommon method of demonfration) that the multitude mentioned in Matth. iii. 5, were all immerfed in the water of Jordan; he fays, "I have no doubt of it, or else they had no " bufiness in Jordan." But, the force of this huge reasoning sounded on the word in, is intirely enervated by what he fays above. For, the Ifraelites were in the cloud and in the fea and not wet with the water of either; consequently the multitude that attended John's baptism might have been in some dry part of the channel in which Jordan flowed, and be baptized, without any application of water at all. But, if, as was certainly the case, the Israelites were baptized in the Red sea by the aspersion of water; why might not the multitude attending John's baptism, be faid to have been baptized in Jordan, and yet have water only poured or fprinkled on them? even though they flood "on dry land?" To infer always a plunging of the whole body in water, because the word in occurs in the narrative, would in many instances be equally false as abfurd. For inflance; our LORD commands the young man born blind to " wash in the pool " of Siloam." Now to accommodate Mr. M.'s logic to this instance, would be to infer that he was plunged all over; " or elfe he had no bufinefs " in" Siloam. But, that the blind man was not immerfed, and yet had very important "bufiness" at the pool, is evident; for, the curing his blindness depended on his washing there. But that his whole body was not immerfed in it is plain; becaufe cause only his eyes were affected, and only this part was to have been washed; in doing which, there was no immersion at all: besides, the Greek word, used to describe the washing, is in John ix. 7, what from with, which is always applied to a partial washing only. What becomes then of the mighty arguments our author sounds on the force of the word in? †

But, to prove, that others thought as well as myself, that there was some analogy between the state of the Israelites when sprinkled by the cloud and sea, and that of a person baptized by as person, I need only quote Walaus. "Which rite; "(that is, SPRINKLING) the baptism in the cloud and sea also savors; of which Paul treats in "I Cor. x." *

V. We urge that no argument decifive in favor of total immertion as the effence of baptifin, can be drawn from the examples recorded in scripture; but, on the contrary, if we are permitted to draw natural inferences from rational premisses, we conclude that the baptisms mentioned there, [†] Even Dr. S. overthrows our author's wonderful logic, founded on the use of the monosyllable in, by the following concession. "What "Baptist ever said or thousant that perions cannor go into the "water, without being plunged in it? or that the expression of "going down into water necessarily includes dipping in it?" Remarks, p 31.—I hope it will be allowed, that a perion who "goes into water" may consequently be said to be in it. And, if according to Dr. S. the application of the former expression does not "necessarily include "dipping," neither does that of the latter. The dispute thus far, is, therefore, between Mr. M. and his oracle.

were performed by sprinkling or pouring of water. Consider we then, 1 The multitudes baptized by John the Baptist, Matth. iii. 5, and by the apostles, Asts ii. 41.—That "Jerusalem and all " Judea, and all the region round about Jordan" in the one instance; and three thousand persons in the other; could not have been baptized by a total immersion, is implicitly evident; (1) because, in the former case, the Baptist's time and strength would have been inadequate to the work; and the fame circumstances of impracticability operate strongly in the latter. Dr. S. indeed, in order to evade the force of this argument, divides the multitude baptized on the day of Pentecost. not only among the apostles, but among the feventy also; though this gentleman, who lays so great a stress on the letter of scripture, as necessary to authenticate practices on other occasions, here departs from his own favorite maxim; for, as the context does not intimate, that the feventy affished upon this occasion, have we not as good a right to urge the filence of scripture against the Doctor here, as he does the very fame circumstance against us in other instances, though with not equal plaufibility of argument? He urges indeed, "that the text does not fay they were baptized " in one day only." p. 116. That is, the words one and only are not mentioned in the text; and therefore the text does not " fay" it. What trifling! But does it not fay, that the very three thousand who had "received the word gladly, " were baptized, and In 'nusea, in that day were " added

" added to the church?" AEts ii. 41. Were not the persons added to the church, the same, that in the former part of the text are faid to have received the word and to have been baptized? And does not the text therefore fay, that their reception of the word, their addition to the church, and their consequent baptism, were circumstances that took place in the same day? Is it therefore to be supposed (without supposing what is improbable and impracticable) that the multitude awakened under Peter's fermon were all immerged? And even if the difficulty upon this occasion was alleviated by the number of administrators; yet how will the fame supposition apply to the Baptist? Surely the ingenious Dr. S. cannot, without a prodigious knack at invention, attempt to demonstrate, that John had the assistance of eighty two joint-administrators in dispenfing the ordinance. We think he would find it difficult to prove, he had one affistant. And yet his number of fubjects feems to have been much greater, than that, which demanded the help of the twelve apostles and seventy disciples; if we confider that he baptized "all Judea and all "ferusalem and all the region, &c." which I should imagine, though not implying all and every of the inhabitants of those places, yet to include a number fuperior to three thousand. How, therefore, one administrator could plunge head-overears fuch an immense and promiscuous multitude of profelytes, is one of those monstrous incredibilities, which feem quite credible to men of Gg 2 our

our author's kidney; but which will ever, to candor and common fense, appear either as abfolute miracle or romance. But suppose John to have baptized by pouring or fprinkling of water; then the incredible and absurd vanish together. (2) We think, that the confideration of modely would lay a confiderable bar against immerging such vast multitudes. For, as it would reflect a charge of indecency on the administrators and the persons baptized, to suppose, that any had been dipt naked; fo it is extremely improbable, that either John's profelytes, or those awakened under Peter's fermon, confisting principally of the poor, could be provided with change of raiment; and if they were, that even in that case, the dispensers of the ordinance would propose an universal immersion, to a promiscuous multitude of men and women; when their undressing and changing their wet garments, must have been attended with a group of circumstances equally inconvenient and indelicate. For, howfocver a few persons in a private baptistery, pre-viously accommodated with change of raiment, might be dipt, with a degree of comparative decency and convenience; yet the baptism of a vast multitude; in a public place; before a number of spectators; at a distance from their respective habitations; and either unprovided with or unable to procure, change of raiment; -I fay, a baptism, attended with fo many insuperable difficulties, could never have been administered by a total immersion; especially when it is considered, that an almost unavoidable infringement of the laws of decency, must have been the consequence. And indeed I cannot help faying, that, although the mode of baptizing, practifed by modern Anabaptists, is not liable to an equal degree of immodesty and inconvenience; yet that some degree of both is hardly avoidable. - It is the defign of the great Head of the church, that every thing in it should be conducted svory musics with decency. And I can never suppose, that he would have enjoined immersion, as effential to baptism, when fuch an institution would be subject, in many inflances, to much indecorum. It is well known, that there were fome, fo invincibly strenuous in their attachment to dipping, as to make it neceffary to the due administration of the ordinance, that the candidates should enter the baptistery quite naked; in order to preferve a strained refemblance to our spiritual nakedness, as well as to keep up a supposed representation of their " putting off the old man;" or as Vossius fays, Quasi non minus nudi baptizarentur quam Adam fuerit in paradifo. Several thameful incidents refulting from this most indecent mode, brought it into gradual difrepute among the Adamites themselves (for so some of these naked dippers were called), and at last into universal disuse. Upon this mode the Anabaptists have confiderably improved, by rejecting this species of indecency, altogether, and by requiring all their candidates to be dipped in garments. But, although they are to be commended, for thus far observing the

the laws of decency; yet I cannot think, that Dr. S.'s argument, in favor of the strict modesty of his mode, taken from the promiscuous bathings at our modern watering-places, is of any force; unless he could prove, that fuch a modern custom were strictly defensible, or that persons there dipped one another. And even if men and women may bathe promiscuously, and modestly too, perhaps, in a modern bath; yet, furely, this will not admit a parallel with the practice of the Anabaptists; where women, appareled in a fingle garment, in a public place, and before several spectators, are taken by a man, and plunged head-over-ears; efpecially, when it is a notorious fact, that fome modest administrators thus immerge women far advanced in their pregnancy: and, this latter circumstance, from which Mr. M.'s conduct is not exempt, I dare pronounce very indecent, as well as extremely dangerous; † and nothing but the most unconquerable resolution to support the cause

[†] In my Letter to Mr. M. p. 23, 24; I advanced an argument against the necessity of baptifinal immersion, founded on the manifest DANGER that would attend fuch a mode; and I instanced in the case of PREGNANT WOMEN; supposing at the same time the danger to be still farther enhanced, if perfons in a state of pregnancy should be immersed in the DEPTH OF WINTER. This being argumentum ad hominem; and the fact I condemned, having been a literal transcript of Mr. M.'s conduct, when in Shrew/bury; either he himself, or probably, his note-making friend ron him, attempts to invalidate my argument in a note, p. 28, by afferting "that cold bathing is recommended by the faculty to pregnant "women; and that sprinkling or pouring of water would be dange-" rous as well as going into the water." In opposition to this evasive stuff, I answer, (I) That the dipper's medical dollrine scems to be founded more upon EMPIRICISM, than upon the principles of physic; and that it exactly comports with the fystem of "the faculty" of the QUACKS; which is fo famous for accelerating the departure of people cause of bigotry, and to keep up the schism at all events, could ever suggest this branch of a mode, to invalidate which, the laws of decency, humanity, and common sense, powerfully concur. Besides, it is not a little extraordinary, that they should, in every instance, invariably practice a total immersion; when they are constrained, themselves, to acknowledge, that a thing or a person may be said to be dipped, when only a part is put under water; which Dr. Gale exemplifies in the case of the hyssop dipped in blood, and that of the nib of a pen dipped in ink; and which he

out of the world: and fince Mr. M. fo cordially embraces their principles, should not that learned body present him with a diploma, as a bright graduate in the system of Æsculapius? and advance him to the still higher honor of being professor of quackery? (2) Supposing, that in some instances, bathing might be recommended to pregnant women; yet, would any person in his senses, recommend it as medicinal in the rigorous month of December? and NOT LONG BEFORE their decumbiture? Not to urge how indelicate an appearance a pregnant woman must make, before a number of spectators, at a Public BATH: I ask, whether the man, who could be the administrator upon such an occasion, must not be lost to every tender sensation, and resemble in his spirit, the unfeeling apathy of a Stoic, rather than the tenderness and delicacy of a Christian? If there be an object upon earth, calculated to excite the nicest sensations of tenderness and sympathy, it is certainly that of a woman, far advanced in her pregnancy. But what are all these tender fensations, and the circumstances that might naturally fuggest them, to Anabaptists? The schism must be kept up, at the hazard of health and life. And, though instant Death might be the consequence of an immersion of pregnant women in the depth of winter; yet what is all this to the neroism of bigotry, and our author's fystem of quackery? (3) When the note-maker (whether Mr. Jenkins or Mr. M. I cannot tell) fays, that " fprinkling of water would" (in cases of sickness) " be dangerous as well as going into water;" I need make not a fingle observation to prove, that his wild position is equally supported by inhumanity and falshood. For, as one justly obferves, "There is a time, when a ferious writer would not trouble " himself to confute or set a WRANGLER right. And 'tis such a one as " this, where the perversity is so great, as to become an infult upon " common fenfe."

corroborates by his memorable maxim "What is "true of any one part separately, is true of the "whole complexly:" and when Mr. M. himself "contends for no more, than that samples signifies to dip;" without supposing, it always implies a total immersion. Considering, therefore, the natural tendency of these concessions, to weaken the force of the Anabaptists' own practice; how shall we account for their notorious deviation from their own un-extorted acknowledgments? Dr. Wall suggests a very probable reason, for their inconsistency, on this head. If, says he, they were to give up dipping all over, in any one instance, "then the schism would be at an end; and that, "you know, would be a dreadful thing."

That others supposed baptismal aspersion was more consistent with modesty, than immersion, is evident, from the following testimony of Vossius. "Besides those other sour reasons, which Thomas "(Aquinas) has brought (in favor of sprinkling), "fome add a sisth, that is, Modesty; on account of which it is more decent, to sprinkle or pour water, on adults."—And with him concurs Chamier. "The use of aspersion is certainly more proper or convenient, both in regard to the inclemency of the weather, and in respect of Modesty." And, the same last-mentioned author supposes it improbable, that

" the three thousand could be baptized, by a "few apostles, in one day, if they were all im-"mersed." "-So does Bonaventure. And well observed it may be, " fince therein, the reason or intent of the facra-"ment, is kept intire." \ -- And of the fame opinion was Nicholaus de Orbellis, who lived Ann. Dom. 1452. "It is not likely, when three thou-" fand were baptized on the day of Pentecost, " that every person had his whole body washed " in water; but precifely with as much as would! " SPRINKLE the face, or admit of its being! " poured on the head." +- To which, give me leave to add that of Dr. Lynwood. "It is very " probable that the apostle Peter, did not bap-"tize by immersion, but by ASPERSION." !-And that John baptized by pouring or sprinkling of water on the subject, and not by immersion, was the opinion of Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, a cotemporary with St. Augustin; as appears from the

Thus have I expatiated the more largely on the probable mode, by which John and Peter baptized; because our positive Anabaptist, is so peremptory in the opposite supposition; and yet has not urged a single argument to support it. All he says, in p. 28, 29, is low sneer, * contemptible irony, and down-right abuse. As to those commentators, who cannot digest improbabilities so easily as our author, and therefore conclude, the baptisms of John and Peter could not have been performed by immersion; of all such he says, "I think" (but thinking and proving

't "He washes away the fins of believers by water POURED on "them, &c." Paulin. Ep. Nolan; ap Rigalt. Not. in Tertul. P. 70.

^{*} I wish, however, when our author is in one of his sneering-moods, that he would take care to fneer grammatically. Having, in p. 29, fuggested an ironical hint respecting the mode of John's baptism, he concludes by faying, "The water would HAVE EMEMEGE FELL on them." I should be glad to know from our author, who seems better acquainted with fneering-moods than with moods of grammar, whether "would " HAVE FELL!" be intended as a specimen of his profound grammatical dispussitions, or of his good "friend" at Wrexham; who hath helped him to so many valuable. " hints" in the note-making style, which he bath further clarified by his corrections of the press. Now. as our author has so modestly declined the office of a "liturgy-mender," as being "a poor mean employment;" I should be glad to know, whether that of a fyntax-mender be not full as mean? especially as our profound emendator hath likewise thought proper to translate imemeos " would have fell." And, fince we have been already favored with some similar specimens of Mr. M.'s genius in mending and Mr. 7.'s in correcting; are they not most happily blended together as a mending daumvirate? .

"be called Bible-menders." Whether it be characteristic of genuine modesty, for a man of his notorious ignorance, to set himself up as a judge of commentators, and to decide upon their rational criticisms, without making one effort of argument to overthrow them; I leave to the judgment of the candid reader. As to his charge against us, of attempting to mend or piece out (his own phrase) our Bibles; I should be glad to know, who are most likely to fall under this imputation? they who bring reason and argument with them in their earnest researches? or the men, who seem determined to make the Bible speak their meaning, even though embarrassed with the greatest improbabilities, and contradicted by the natural suggestions of common sense?

VI. The next example, on which our Anabaptist triumphs, under the wing of an anonymous friend, is that of the jailor. In order to support the idea of his having been baptized by immersion, he is obliged to have recourse to the following suppositions, viz. that the jailor "had a "refervoir of water in the prison;" or that he was dipt in an adjacent river. And yet this is the gentleman, who charges us with resting all our opinions respecting the baptisms mentioned in scripture, on suppositions, probabilities, &c. But in the present instance, his charge manifestly recoils on himself. For, his supposition that there was a little pond of water or well, in the prison, is not supposable; and his probability, that the jailor was plunged in the river, is improbable; if we confider, that the baptism was performed at midnight; and that the administrator, whose body was galled with stripes, could not, without manifest peril, enter a river or even a domestic reservoir of water, at such an unseasonable hour of the night. Besides, if immersion had been the mode, the inconveniencies and danger, might have been in some measure obviated, by postponing it to the ensuing morning. Yet we are told, that "the jailor and all his were " baptized ftraightway." Acts. xvi. 33. So that, as there is not the least intimation in the history, that they went out to any river; confidering the time of night, the unhealed state of the Apostles' stripes, as well as the improbable circumstance of there being a quantity of water in the prison, fufficient for an immersion of the whole body; is it not more rational to suppose, the ordinance to have been administered by an affusion of water? And with this fupposition corresponds the opinion of Chamier. " Nor was there at hand within the " prison, as much water as would be necessary "for immer fron." +

But, in a note, p. 32, we are confronted with a quotation from Witfius; which, according to the note-maker's translation, seems, at first fight, to militate with our supposition; but, which upon a nearer examination, will be found not so much to our author's purpose. Speaking of the Jailor's baptism, Witsius says, Sacris lymphis tinetus christianismi mysteriis initiatus sit. Thete words, Mr. M. or his good "friend that has fuggested" the important "hint" in the note, translates "Being " dipped in the facred fream, &c." But this translation is palpably false, in more respects than one. For (1) it contradicts the history, by fupposing, that the jailor went out of his house to some neighboring stream of water to be baptized; which fiream, our author supposes to be the river mentioned in Acts xvi. 13. But, it is plain from the apostle's narrative, that the baptism was performed within a part of the prison: for it is faid that " he brought Paul and Silas out;" " the " meaning of which is" fays Dr. Stennett, (Remarks, p. 113), " that he brought them out of " the inner prison, into which he had before "thrust them;" and (p. 114), "before he led " them into his house." And the Doctor supposes there was "a pool within the bounds of the ". prison;" and that therein the jailor was dipped. So that Mr. M.'s translation at once contradicts. both the scripture and his own oracle. (2) But I am apprehensive it does not express the meaning of Withus himself. For, as I think he was full as great an expositor and critic as Mr. M. I can never conceive him capable of contradicting a plain historical narrative, and therefore not intending a ftream by the word lymphis; the natural fignification of which is water. (3) Nor can it be proved from his using the word tinctus, that he supposed a total immersion to have been the mode.

mode. For, that tingo and immergo are not convertible terms, is apparent, from the diftinction of the great Dr. Whitaker. TINCTIONE contenti, quam sufficere putarunt, IMMERSIONEM non desiderabant.* Dr. Holdsworth, observes the same distinction. "Baptism in some churches is used by immersion; in others, by sprinkling le"vemque TINCTIONEM and a partial dipping." This is farther warranted by that remarkable use of the word tingo, in Martial.

No one furely was ever immersed in spikenard. Horace intimates it was poured on the head, when he fays, Achamenia PERFUNDI nardo, and,--PER-Fusus liquidis urget odoribus. - Cicero, speaking of an indifferent scholar, calls him literis LINCTUS. But if our author was to have brought his overwhelming doctrine to these words, he would probably have translated them, " all immerfed in " letters." And then, though the literary immerfion would not have been characteristical of our author's profundity of learning, yet it would have been perfectly correspondent with his accuracy, as a translator.—Lyttleton, in his Dictionary, translates tinctus, baptized. Yet he renders tingo, from whence it is derived, to fprinkle. From these instances of the use of the word, it is apparent it fignifies to tinge, to dip a part, to sprinkle, to pour; and is in general acknowledged, by critics facred and profane, to imply fomething different from immergo. Admitting this, I think it more than probable, that Withus did not mean to infinuate by the terms lymphis tinctus, that the jailor was baptized either in a stream, or by a total immersion. And the same arguments which expose our author's blundering translation of Withus, are equally conclusive against the inferences which he and his oracle draw from the words δαπω and δαπωίω, in favor of dipring. For, fince critics, commentators, lexicographers, and divines, all unite, in rendering these two words by the Latin tingo and lavo; + and fince neither the one nor the other necessarily implies immersion, or dipping at all, but frequently sprinkling, pouring, &c. consequently, the fignification of the Greek words and of their correspondent Latin concludes nothing abfolutely in favor of immerfion, and manifestly countenances the opposite modes of baptifinal afperfion and effusion.-Thus, I hope it has appeared how little cause our author had to triumph from the "hint" his "friend" gave him of introducing an apposite quotation from Witsius: and that as Cicero describes a sprinkling of literature under the terms literis tinctus; fo by a parallel translation, lymphis tinclus may very properly fignify a being sprinkled with water.

^{* &}quot;Being content with a flight dipping, which they thought suffise cient, they did not desire immersion." Whitaker. Prol. De Sacram. Bapt. ix. 1. P. 216.

VIII. I procede, now, to confider a charge, brought against us, by the suggester of the "hint" in the note, p. 30; which he thinks, fo tremendous, as to hang like a huge milftone about the neck of our reasoning. This heavy charge is not less, than that there is an "exact resemblance" between our reasoning on the examples of baptism, mentioned in scripture, and that, by which Woolston, and other deistical writers, labor to invalidate. the history of our LORD's miracles. That is, reader, Deists blaspheme the history of the Savior's miracles, by their manner of commenting upon them: and Mr. M. or his note-maker, fays, there is an "exact resemblance" between their mode of reasoning and ours; insomuch that, what he stigmatizes as "cavil" in the Deifts, he accommodates to us, as adopting "the fame kind of " wretched cavil:" consequently an indirect charge of blasphemy lies against us. But, furely our author, before he represented our conduct, as a blasphemous imitation of the Deists, should have weighed the awful imputation, in the balance of candor and truth. For, if, upon a fair examination, it should appear, that he has most shamefully mifrepresented us; I fancy he will find it difficult to exculpate himself from the charge of a glaring violation of the ninth commandment.

The whole of his plaufible fophistry is detected and refuted, by the following confiderations.

Deift's blasphemous arguments, concern a miraele; our reasoning, respects only an ordinary baptism; in the dispensing of which, there was not one miraculous circumstance. If the three thoufand had been all immerfed by an extraordinary act; no person, who reverences the Bible, would for a moment hesitate, to admit the authenticity of the fact. But, when a prodigious multitude are faid to have been baptized by John, or by a few Apostles, without any intervention of miracle; and when the facred history is filent as to the mode and circumstances of an ordinance administered to fo great a number: are we not left to confider on which fide reason preponderates, and to draw our conclusions accordingly? In every narrative, where scripture observes a total filence respecting circumstantials; we are to determine where there is the greatest degree of probability: and when one fide of the question is inadmissible, but upon the implication of miracle, where however nothing miraculous is recorded; we are to reject that, and to embrace the fide, which appears unembarraffed with difficulties and improbabilities; and this may be done, confiftently with the deepest submission to revelation, and the highest reverence for truth. Apply this in the present instance.—The history of the New Testament records baptisms, administered to vast multitudes, by one or a few administrators; without relating the specific mode. Suppose these baptisms to have been performed miraculously; the immersion of thousands in a day, is credible. remove remove that supposition of an extraordinary circumstance; and the fact is embarrassed with numerous incredibilities. Whereas, if you suppose the mode on those occasions to have been sprinkling or pouring of water; the narrative is immediately difencumbered from feveral difficult and impro--bable circumstances, which would otherwise give it the appearance of miracle, or fiction.

(3) The Deift, by his impious fophistry, would invalidate the history of our Lord's miracles altogether. But furely Mr. M. must know in his conscience, that the scope of our reasoning does not affect the history itself, but a particular cir-cumstance, which Anabaptists annex to it, and which is founded on incredible abfurdity. Woolfion blasphemously concludes his chain of sophisiry, by faying, "the whole history (of the miracles) is monstrously absurd." But we aftert, that the whole history of the baptisms recorded in scripture, is founded on truth, and warranted by the most credible facts. Our dispute, therefore, with Anabaptists, does not respect the history of baptifins; but the more probable mode by which they were administered. So that, if Mr. M. is not lost to every generous feeling of candor and modefly; must not a blush cover his face, and a sensation of guilt strike his conscience, for daring to affert before the public, "that there is an exact refem-" blance between our mode of reasoning on the " baptisms, and that of Deifts on the miracles,

(4) Our author feems not a little skilled in the arts of low fophistry: and, by his fophistical legerdemain, he blinds the eyes of the reader, and gives an air of plautibility to the most fallacious reasoning. Take the following instance .- In order to point out, what he injuriously styles, the " exact refemblance" between our reasoning, and the blasphenry of Woolston, he introduces us as quærying, " How could fo many be baptized in " fo thort a time?" But, reader, if you will only wipe off the varnith of this gentleman's fophithry, you will eafily detect the glaring falthood, that skulks under this disingenuous coloring. We do not ask "how could so many be BAPTIZED?" but how could so many be PLUNGED in so short a time? That so many were baptized, we have not the finallest doubt: and that they were baptized, by pouring or sprinkling of water, we have all the reaton in the world, to believe; fince the contrary supposition is manifestly clogged with a variety of incredible circumstances. When therefore the note-maker fays, " It will shew them (p. 32) " that by this method of talking, a man may " prove quodlibet ex quolibet; and To! take heed, + " left by reasoning in this manner, they do inad-" vertently put weapons into the hands of in-" fidels;" he manifestly drops a double hint that reverberates on himself. For, when a man will prove, that three thousand persons were all immersed by a few apostles in one day, under a variety of inconvenient and impracticable circumflances; I ask, whether an adept in such huge logic, might not, on the fame principle, attempt to prove any thing from any thing? And, I ask again, who are most likely " to put weapons into the hands of infidels?" they, who feem to discard reason in the investigation of truth? or they, whose researches are founded on her most vigorous exertions, and most rational decisions?-They, whose premises are full of the marvellous, and whose conclusions are fraught with abfurdity? Or they, who in the examination of the implicit or ambiguous parts of a narrative, argue with precision, and decide on the part of credibility? -They, who make scripture bow to their preconceived notions, in direct opposition to the dictates of reason and common sense? Or they, whose arguments are founded on a coalition of fcripture and right reason?

VIII. As to the other baptisms, mentioned in scripture, viz. those of the Apostle Paul, the Eunuch, Cornelius and the other Gentile converts, &c. there is no absolute proof that they were administered, in any of these instances, by immersion. There is implicit proof to the contrary; if we may be allowed to reason on these passages. The case of the Eunuch, we have already considered. As to that of Paul; if we consider the previous weak state of his health, rendered so by his sasting three days; and the improbability of Judas's having a baptistery in his house: there is evident intimation that he was not plunged.—And, as to

Cornelius and the other Gentile converts; the very words of the parrative manifefuly imply, that they were baptized by an affusion of water brought into the house for that purpose. "Can any "man forbid water, that these should not be baptized." Acts x. 47. On which passage Dr. Doddridge observes, "It seems most natural to "understand it, as Dr. Whitby does, Who can forbid that water should be brought? In which view of the clause one would naturally conclude, (N. B.) they were baptized by Pouring "water on them, rather than by plunging "them in it." #

Walæus observes, speaking of the validity of baptismal aspersion, Exempla adspersion in scripturis possion deprehendi; Examples of Sprinkling may be found in scripture. And that Aurelius Prudentius thought the Baptist's mode was that of sprinkling or pouring of water, is evident from that remarkable line,

" PERFUNDIT fluvio pastus Baptista locustis." +

However, as the Anabaptists lay a prodigious stress on the baptism of our Savior, supposing the mode to have been immersion; I will consider the history of that circumstance a little more particularly.—The Evangelist informs us that "Jesus when he was baptized, went up

" Araightway out of the water." Matth. iii. 6. In order to invalidate the arguments urged in favor of total immersion as the mode, upon this occasion, I would observe (1) That no absolute conclusion can be drawn from the original of the word baptize; fince we have before proved, that it does not necessarily fignify to dip. (2) Nor can the expression, out of the water, decide in favor of immersion; although we thould suppose that our LORD was in Jordan. According to Dr. S.'s concession (p. 77.) "I know not who " fays, that his coming out of the water, neces-" farily infers his being plunged in it." And yet the Doctor in the very next fentence, manifestly contradicts himself. For he adds, " If he was " in it, it must have been for the purpose of his " being immersed in it." And he infists too, that his coming out of it, proves he was in " it." Now, reader, review this wonderful logic. He acknowledges, that "his coming out of the " water does not necessarily infer his being plung-" ed in it." Yet he argues, that " his coming " out of it proves he was in it; and that if he was so in it, it must have been for the purpose of his being immerfed in it." So that the Doctor grants, that our Lo'RD's coming out of the water is no proof that he was plunged in it; and yet in the very fame breath, he argues that it was. His reasoning therefore equally concludes, for and against us, as well as for and against HIMSELF; and is equally and doubly felf-contradictory. (3) Nor

(3) Nor does the expression went up out of the water, prove that he was in it, or that he was immersed. For welly he went up, describes his ascent to the higher ground about Jordan; and was signifies away from: He might be said therefore to have gone away from Jordan, without necessarily supposing that he was immersed in it. (4) But admitting that he was in; does that necessarily infer his having been plunged? No, Dr. S. himfelf being judge. Do not we say of a person standing only up to the ancies in a river, that he is in it, without necessarily including the idea of an immersion in it? No one would be so absurd as to say he stood out of it, only because a part of the body was wet.

Since, therefore, neither the history of the paffage, nor any criticisms upon it, demonstrate that our Lord was baptized by immersion; have we not good right to infer the mode to have been an essurious of water? For my own part, it seems a natural supposition, that our Lord, taking off his sandals, walked into Jordan, and that john poured water on his head. This circumstance would bear a correspondent reference to the pouring on Aaron's head, the sacred oil that ran down to the skirts of his garments; which presigured the out-pouring of the gifts and graces of the Spirit on the Son of God; of which an essusion of baptismal water would also be a lively emblem. So that as the pouring of the sacred oil on Aaron denoted his initiation to the priesthood; in like manner, an effusion of water in baptism, fignified at once, the pouring out of the Spirit on the Redeemer, and his solemn inauguration to the high offices of prophet, priest, and king. To authenticate this natural supposition, the following quotation from St. Bernard, may be deemed sufficient.—" The angels descend, and all the troops of heaven run with reverence to their Creator. The creature POURS water infundit aquam on the head of his Creator; and a mortal hanged descend of him who was his God." to

C H A P. VII.

Those passages in the Old Testament and Apocrypha, where the word Constign occurs, considered.—Its signification farther ascertained from Critics, Lexicographers, and Divines.—The force of Dr. S.'s quotations from Calvin, Beza, Vossius, repelled; and the disingenuity of them detected.—Some additional testimonies from antiquity in favor of baptismal aspersion.—The debate resumed with the "fevere opposer."—A few heads of advice proposed to his serious consideration.

IN order to support their practice, the Anabaptists are obliged to maintain that the Greek word $\omega \pi / \omega \omega$ always fignifies to dip, as well as its primitive $\omega \pi / \omega$; and they are under an unavoidable necessity of declaring likewife, that, where either of these words is applied, it includes the idea of a total immersion, necessarily. But they are necessitated to prove this to be the case, in every instance. For if a single exception can be produced from fcripture, or from the purest Critics and Lexicographers; it invalidates all their arguments, and points out at once the bigotry and abfurdity interwoven with their invariable practice of total immersion. Many fuch exceptions I have already produced, and hope to produce a few more. Before I begin the examination of this part of the subject, I beg the reader to keep in mind the opinion of K L that that accurate critic Leigh. Speaking of the controverted word, he fays, "Which word (as He"fychius, Stephanus, Scapula and Budæus, the great

"masters of the Greek tongue make good by
"very many instances and allegations out of classic "writers) importeth no more than ablution or "washing. Bantus (say they in their Lexicons and Commentaries) lavo; Earlin μα lavatio, which "may be done without dipping."

I. As it is Caπ/ιζω, and not Caπ/ω, that is always appropriated to the ordinance of baptifin; our business at present will be to investigate the meaning of this derivative, as it is used in the Old Testament. It occurs about four times in the Septuagint Version and the Apocrypha. That in I/. xxi. 4, is a figurative expression; and therefore nothing to the purpose. The account of Naaman's washing himself, mentioned in ii. Kings, v. affords no absolute proof that he was immersed. As is thrice used to express his washing, and Caπliζω once; a proof this, that these two words are used promiscuously for each other. And as we have already feen in more instances than one, that Asw, does not necessarily imply a washing of the whole body; consequently no decisive argument can be brought to prove, that Gamligus, in the present case, signifies immersion. Besides, it does not appear that Naaman was leprous all over; fince it is faid, he thought that the prophet would come out " and strike his hand over the " place." Ver. 11. Supposing therefore, a part only to been affected with the leprofy; what need is there to suppose an immersion of his whole body? any more than in the case of the young man mentioned in John ix. who is said to have washed in Siloam, although he did no more than wath his eyes?—Of the two in the Apocrypha, the one respects Judith's wathing herself. The passage in Jud. xii. 7, runs thus, και εβαπλίζειο επι της πηγης τε υδωζος. She baptized or washed herself at, not in, a spring of water, in the camp. And it appears that the fprings in the camp were guarded with foldiers. So that here is no proof that the washed her whole body.—The other is in Ecelus. xxiv. 26. 'ο δαπλίζομεν σπο νεκρεν " He " that is washed" or baptized, "from" or after touching "a dead body," &c. This is the paffage that frighted Dr. Gale fo prodigiously; upon his finding that in Num. xix. 18, perfons under a defilement after touching a dead body, were to be purified by a SPRINKLING of the water of separation; which the fon of Syrach calls a being baptized. A passage this, so clear against the essentiality of dipping, that I wonder the Doctor's fright did not arrive at fuch a degree, as to intimidate him from ever maintaining that Earlica never fignifies any thing but to dip.—Dr. Stennett, refers us to a passage in ii. Mac. i. 21, for which I am much obliged to him; because it effectually overthrows all the arguments he has ever urged, or can urge, for the indifpensable necessity of immersion, drawn from the fignification of the Greek word. The Doctor has passed over the reference very flightly; but I shall consider it Kk 2 par-particularly.—The Apocryphal passage alluded to respects an intended sacrifice to have been performed by fire, which the priests had hid in a hollow pit; upon fearching which, instead of fire, they found 'υδωρ παχυ thick water. This water Neemias, it is faid, commanded them to draw, (N.B.) anc-Calarras, wetting the altar, &c. with it. But how was this to be performed? The close of the twenty-first verse informs us. " Neemias com-" manded the priests (N. B.) to SPRINKLE" επιβράναι to RHANTIZE " the wood with the "water, &c." So that here was a baptism of the wood, &c. executed by sprinkling. And what is not a little remarkable, even the primitive Canla is used fynonymously with eastw. And this one instance, cuts up every argument of Dr. S. even though embellished with all the advantageous coloring of his plaufible pen.

II. Lexicographers, Critics, and Divines in general, give Earli the fignification of washing. Scapula, Hedericus, Trommius, Pasor, Leigh, are all unanimous in translating it lavo, abluo. Suidas, besides the special signification of dipping, gives it the general one of wetting, washing, cleansing, and therefore translates it madefacio, lavo, abluo, purgo, &c. — The learned Piscator, after acknowledging that immersion might have been the mode in the antient church, immediately adds, "Yet the word Carli Sau signifies ont only to be dipped, but likewise to be figurished, washed, or cleansed, Quâvis aliâ "Ratione,

From these testimonies, so full to the point, I leave the reader to judge, if the matter is to be decided by the authority of the most eminent

Critics, whether our fide of the question has not the advantage of a confiderable majority: And, when Dr. S. would infinuate, that the Greek word " only fignifies dipping;" and attempts to ground this undemonstrated affertion on the fentiments of Lexicographers and Divines; whether his infinuation does not favor more of the plaufibility of finooth language, than the conclusiveness of folid argumentation. In order "fatisfac-" torily to prove his affertion," he should have demonstrated that it is supported by the opinions of all the eminent Critics, or at least of the majority. But he has not demonstrated either the one or the other; and consequently, on this head, has proved nothing. Rather, the quotations, wherewith I have confronted his, prove the very reverse of all his infinuations.

of confidering the force of some quotations which the Doctor has taken from Calvin, Beza, and Vossius. Which I the rather do, because I shall at once be enabled to produce some additional testimonies from these great men, to the validity of baptismal aspersion or essuance for his side that plausible fallacy by which Dr. S. would institute they were strenuous advocates for his side of the argument, only.—(1) To begin with Calvin. In a note, p. 59, of the Doctor's Remarks, the reader is presented with a quotation from the Institutes of that great Reformer; in which he acknowledges that the word baptize signifies to dip, and that dipping was sometimes practised in the antient church; respecting both which particulars, we perfectly coincide with Calvin. But does this eminent cafuist mean, that to dip is the only fignification of the word? or that baptifu should be administered only by immerfion? Quite the contrary. For, in the very passage which the Doctor has notoriously, and I should imagine, defignedly too, curtailed, the beginning of the fentence, of which his extract is the conclusion, directly overthrows the Doctor's infinuation. These are Calvin's words. " But " whether he that is dipt, be immersed once " or thrice; or WHETHER HE BE ONLY SPRIN-" KLED WITH WATER POURED ON HIM, IT " IS NOT MATERIAL." +-And that the prescribed form of administration composed by Calvin, for the church of Geneva, evidently corresponded with these sentiments, is undeniably plain from the following passage in another part of his writings. "Then the minister pours water on the "infant, faying, N. I baptize thee, &c." 1-I ask then, in the name of candor and common fense, what advantage can Dr. S. or any of his brethren reap from the testimony of Calvin? Or rather indeed, I should ask, whether the opinion of that great Reformer does not directly militate against the hypothesis, which the Anabaptists in general, and Dr. S. in particular, labor to establith? And for what purpose could the Doctor produce this mangled quotation? He informs us indeed, p. 58, in words, which are the more extraordinary, because they usher in the extract from Calvin, that " he would add concessions " from fome learned Pædobaptists, as to the "TRUE and proper meaning of the word." But furely, either Calvin is contradicted by himself, or mifrepresented by his quoter. The latter I suppose to be the true state of the case. For, if Calvin thought, according to the Doctor's affertion, that to dip was the only "true and " proper fense of the word" baptize; he never furely would have said, that it was " immate-" rial whether the fubject was sprinkled or dip-" ped;" nor would he have prescribed a form of administration as consonant with that sentiment; if he had not esteemed it " a true and proper" one," founded on the "true and proper" meaning of the word. From hence, therefore, it is plain, that the Doctor, by difmembering the quotation from Calvin, has kept the whole of his real fentiments out of view; that by fo doing, he has attempted to put upon the "bright taper " of Geneva," a temporary extinguisher, called disingenuity; or rather, has raised a little dust of plaufibility, before the reader's eyes, whereby he might prevent him from feeing his true meaning; and that by classing the extract from Calvin with the opinion of Grotius, he intended to represent the former as partial in favor of dipping, as the latter: which Dr. S. himfelf is confcious not to have been the case. It is the part of ingenuity, in making quotations, to present the whole of the passage to the reader, that he may be able to form a judgment of the original author's real opinion. Because, if it be produced in a state of dismemberment, an author may be made to fpeak for and against the same subject. It happens very frequently, as in the present remarkable instance, that the former part of a fentence is declarative of an author's decifive judgment, while the latter contains only a qualifying concession; or vice versa. Would it be candid to take the detached concession, and hold it forth to the public, as containing the fum of the author's opinion? Calvin's concession, is what Dr. S. has laid before the public; his genuine fentiments, what I have refcued from their state of artful concealment. Calvin acknowledges that Carlie fignifies to dip. But does he declare it carries that fignification only? No; Dr. S. is conscious he afferts the contrary in the portion of the fentence, which he has omitted. Calvin confesses that baptism was administered by immersion in the antient church. But does he declare it to have been the only mode then, or the only proper mode to be adopted now? No; that Reformer's fentiments and practice prove the contrary. Therefore, for the same reason that Dr. S. has brought a mangled passage from Calvin, as "a concession to the true " and proper meaning of the word" baptize; he might with equal justice quote me; because, tho' I grant with the Geneva Reformer, that the word fignifies to dip; and that the ordinance might L. 1 have have been administered by immersion in the antient church; yet I join issue with the same person in his own memorable words, which Dr. S. prudently kept out of sight; Cæterum mergaturne totus qui tingitur, idque ter an semel, an INFUSÂ aquâ ASPERGATUR minimum refert.

(2) The Doctor has produced two quotations from Beza, mentioned, the one, p. 51, and the other, p. 59, of his Remarks. The former of these passages respects the meaning of Carlico, in Mark vii. 4; which in that particular place, Beza makes to fignify more than negvirila. But admitting this, it concludes nothing absolutely in favor of the Doctor's argument. For, although Beza gave it as his opinion, that the word in Mark fignified to dip all over; yet, it is plain, he did not suppose that to be its only fignification; which the restrictive words (" hoc in loco") indeed manifeftly intimate. Befides, I have produced the joint authorities of Dr. Wall and Dr. Pocock, + as agreeing that the baptism or washing mentioned in Luke xi. 38, was nothing more than a washing of the hands, and as quoting Beza " faying the " fame." So that, although Beza acknowledged that Carlicen fignified more than x sover lew in in Mark vii. 4, yet he declared they were of the fame fightification in Luke. A washing of the hands therefore, according to Beza, or a partial wathing of the body, is a baptifin. And from hence it is evident, that Dr. S. has, fo far, gained nothing absolutely by his quotation from Beza.

In the other passage, the Doctor represents Beza as acknowledging, that Caπ (ω fignifies to dip, and to wath, by confequence. But, did he mean hereby to exclude every fignification from the word, but that of immersion? or to confine the administration of baptism to that mode only? Quite the reverse. Let Beza's own words testify. " Are they therefore improperly baptized, who "may be SPRINKLED with water only cast on them? No: What is merely effential in that " action (to wit, the washing of water), is rightly " observed by the Church." From these remarkable words of Beza, it is evident he thought (1) That a washing with water is the effential in baptism: (2) That this wathing may be performed by fprinkling, as well as any other mode; and that washing and sprinkling are therefore convertible terms, when appropriated to the ordinance: (3) That aspersion is a valid mode of baptism. From whence it follows, (4) That those persons, whom Dr. S. represents as partakers only of "a supposititious baptism," Beza esteemed " properly baptized." And with what grace therefore Dr. S. can quote this great man, as making concessions really advantageous to his fide of the question, I leave the reader to judge.

(3) Vossius is quoted with the same design as the other authors. But his authority is of no more real fervice to the cause. For, that he did not mean to limit the fignification of the word to the idea of immersion only; and confequently did not suppose that baptism would be invalidated by any other mode; is evident from that passage which I have already quoted from him: and as it is a very remarkable one, and particularly apposite here, I will translate and transcribe it a second time.—" But from the " other opinion, by which Carlicen fignifies to " walh, it is transferred to the gift of the Holy "Spirit; to wit, because that he may cleanse " the foul, he is POURED out on it, like water: " as foel faith, &c." + From these words it is apparent. (1) That Vossius supposed a scriptural/ analogy between the baptifinal water and the washing of regeneration: (2) That this analogy was transfered from the one to the other, because of the comprehensive fignification of the Greek word: (3) That Earli (31) fignified to wash in general; and to pour out, as well as dip in particular: (4) That the pouring out of water in baptism was an emblematic representation of the effusion of the Spirit; and the validity of that mode was warranted as well by the striking analogy between the fign and thing fignified, as by the extensive meaning of the Greek word.

Whatever concessions therefore, Dr. S. may have taken from Vollius, respecting the fignification of the Greek word, and the mode it pointed out; the above passage, which exhibits his opinion at large, demonstrates, that he did not coincide with Anabaptists in their unwarranted and bigoted condemnation of every other mode, except that of dipping: but that, on the contrary, he esteemed an effusion of the baptismal water, as fignificant and valid, as immersion. So that from hence it is undeniably plain, that Dr. S. fails, in the principal intent of his quotations from Calvin, Beza and Volfius: fince not one of this learned Triumvirate favors his doctrine of the effentiality of dipping. And to produce fuch testimonies, under the difingenuous form of difmembered quotation, is to throw dust in the reader's eyes. Yet this mode is common with Anabaptists: And I am forry to have an opportunity of bringing the charge against Dr. S. But that his conduct merits it, is evident. Whenever, therefore, Anabaptists produce extracts from authors, I would have the reader to keep in mind the observations I have dropped on the difingenuity of exhibiting only one fide of an author's fentiments, and of concealing that, which is immediately to the point.‡ When Anabaptists want to recommend

[‡] A remarkable instance of this nature just occurs to my mind. Mr. Sandys in his wonderful decad of borrowed effertions, which he has mistaken for so many proofs, has exactly imitated the conduct of Dr. S. This poorest of all poor hackney-retailers of quotation, probably after digging into the voluminous mass of Danvers or Tombes, brings forth some testimonics, with which he vapors prodigiously. They contain their favorite mode, they generally exhibit a firing of quotations from some Pædobaptists respecting the fignification of the word $\Im \pi \Im \omega$. A superficial reader, upon seeing a list of venerable names, acknowledging that the word signifies to dip, and that immersion was practised in the antient

the opinion of some Pædobaptists, respecting the meaning of the word βαπίζω. An inconfiderate reviewer of this quoter's borrowed decad, would be apt at first fight to conclude, that the twin-disputant had availed himself of authorities, exceedingly advantageous to the badge of his party, viz. the effentiality of dipping. But fallacy is marked in legible characters on the vehicle of these borrowed goods. The authors he mentions, acknowledge the Greek word fignifies to dip. And who denies that? But do they fay, that is its only fignification? or that baptifm cannot be administered with propriety in any other mode? I should imagine the quoter himself must be conscious they do not. As to Calvin, who heads his lift, I have faid enough, to prove from the very words of the Reformer himself, that he justified both in principle and practice, the validity of fprinkling or pouring water in baptifm. In order to detect the fallacy that lurks under the whole ftring of this man's quotations, proceed we from the first to the last but one; because it is a striking instance. It contains a laconic extract from Poole. This judicious commentator, in a note on Matt. xx. 22, acknowledges, (what we never denied), that to baptize in some applications of the word, fignifies to dip; and that under that particular fignification of the word, it is fometimes accommodated to the idea of complicated fufferings, in which a person may be faid to be overwhelmed. But did Foole mean, by this concession, to restrict the fignification of the word, or the validity of the ordinance to that idea only? The quotation infinuates he did; otherwise it is nothing to the quoter's purpose. But that the commentator did not, let his own words on Matt. iii. 6, and Ads viii. 38, testify. 4. From hence it will NOT follow, that dipping is ESSENTIAL to baptism: the washing of the " blood of CHRIST (the thing fignified in baptism) being expressed by sprinkling or pouring of water, as well as by dipping .-- Sprin-" KLING is AS EFFECTUAL as washing (all over), and as fignificative " also, representing the sprinkling of the blood of the Paschal Lamb, " which prefignified the fprinkling of the blood of Jesus. It is not " the MORE or the LESS of the outward element, which makes the fa-" eraments effectual; but they are effectual only, as they are God's " appointment."-From this specimen, the reader may judge how far Anabaptists are to be trusted, when they make quotations.

church, would be ready to conclude from this plaufible reprefentation, that the authors quoted were absolute fautors of the peculiarities of Anabaptism. But, in every instance of this nature, the reader must be careful to inquire, whether the authorities are fairly exhibited; whether they mean to infinuate, that the word has no other fignification than that of dipping; and that baptism can be administered with scriptural propriety in that mode only. This fimple inquiry will inflantaneously dissolve the charm, and detect the notorious fallacy of the difingenuous representation. Suppose, for instance, the reader is presented with extracts from Calvin and Beza, acknowledging, that Earlie fignifies to dip. It would certainly be to the advantage of an Anabaptift, that these two great men should give it as their opinion, that this was the only fignification of the word, and that baptism was invalidated by any other mode. But, the reader upon examining into the whole of their fentiments, would find they afferted the very reverse of the Anabaptist's infinuation: confequently he would perceive, that to produce them in detached portions, was palpably collufive; especially as such a partial representation of them was intended to infinuate a perfect coincidence in opinion with the quoter. Suppose, in the several extracts I have made from different authors, who give to the Greek word Caπliζω the general fignification of washing, and who affert the validity of administering the ordinance by pouring or fprinkling of water; I had Audiously studiously omitted their fentiments concerning the propriety of immersion, with a design to make my readers believe, that they did not suppose the Greek word fignified to dip, or that immersion was a mode of baptizing: by fuch unfair reprefentation, although I should have given a glaring specimen of difingenuity, I should nevertheless have exactly imitated the conduct of Dr. S. and fome of his brethren. As therefore I have not intended in my quotations from authors, to infinuate, that they exclude from the word Carlica the idea of immersion, or from baptism, the correspondent mode: so Dr. S. when he quoted Calvin, Beza, &c. should have observed a similar display of ingenuous concession; and the rather, because some readers might suppose these great men thought dipping effential to baptism; which Dr. S. is conscious not to have been the case: Besides, though it is sufficient for our side of the argument, that they acknowledge aspersion to be a valid mode of administration, while they admit dipping too; yet the Doctor's fentiments and practice require, that the authors he quotes, thould be advocates for immersion, and for that only, as the effence of baptism. But, fince his quotations fail in this circumstance, they prove nothing to the Doctor's purpofe.

IV. As Anabaptists infinuate, that the adminiftering baptisin by aspersion, is not only of spurious, but likewise of modern date; I propose laying before the reader a few extracts, which may convince him that this mode, however abused and ridiculed under the sneering epithet of rhantism, stands recommended by the fanction of orthodoxy and the practice of antiquity. Even Bithop Taylor, whom the Anabaptists are so fond of quoting, because of his strong concessions in favor of dipping, yet acknowledges in his Ductor dubitantium, B. iii. Ch. iv. Ru. 15, that, with respect to the opposite mode of sprinkling, "the Church of England does not want some Good Examples in the purest times to counte-"nance the permission" of it.

I shall not repeat that remarkable passage from Justin Martyr's fecond Apology, which intimates that fo early as the middle of the fecond century, the heathens introduced a mode of purification by sprinkling into their ceremonies, in imitation of a correspondent mode of baptism, previously adopted by the Christians of that early period. If the reader will turn back to p. 200, he will fee the passage in the original, together with the use I have made of it, in its proper connexion with a particular branch of the subject .-- I Tertullian, notwithstanding the veneration which Anabaptifts profess for his testimony, and the prodigious stress they lay upon it, drops a hint however, which contains a manifest reference to the use of baptifinal asperfion in his days. Speaking to an impenitent person, he says, "Quis enim tam infidæ pænitentiæ viro ASPERGINEM unam cujuslibet aquæ commodabit? To a man, in whose repentance for little confidence can be placed, who will give one Mm in these remarkable words, refered to water in baptism, from the sprinkling of which he prohibited an impenitent hypocrite, appears obvious from the preceding part of the passage. And the testimony is so express to the usage of baptismal aspersion in Tertullian's days, that, in my opinion, nothing really forcible can be said against it.

2 Lactantius, who lived about the close of the third century, is a no less authentic witness. His styling baptism the "SPRINKLING of the "purifying dew," is an evident proof that he thought this expression descriptive, not only of our Savior's baptism, the mention of which it immediately follows, but likewise of a valid mode of administration, which was practised in his own time.

3 Athanasius, that illustrious light of the fourth century, in his third Oration against the Arians, whom he justly charges with equivocating on the form of baptisin, says that others imitated their horrid collusion: and that, while their mental refervations concerning the persons in the Godhead classed with their verbal professions, the ordinance was to them upon that account totally invalidated; insomuch that "He who was "sprinkled consideration their impiety" (not through any defect in the mode) "rather defiled than washed;" to the mode) "rather defiled than washed;" to the mode) "Tertull. I translate hurges Dai, which probably, in order to keep up the antithesis in the sentence, ought to have been written heres Dai.—Since therefore, Athanasius does not say any thing against the mode of baptism, practised among the Arians, but against their blasphemous collusions respecting the names of the blessed Trinity mentioned in the form; is it not plain, that sprinkling was esteemed valid in the administration of baptism, and was accordingly practised in that remarkable æra of the church.

4 In the ninth century florished Walafridus Strabo, "the Anabaptists' grand patron" as one calls him. Speaking of the baptism of Lucillus, which, according to Bishop Taylor, St. Laurence administered to him in a prison, by pouring water on him; he (Wal. Strabo) adds, "It is to be "NOTED" (Note it then, ye advocates for the effentiality of dipping) "that MANY have been baptized, and still may be baptized, not only by dipping, but also by Pouring water on "them."*

5 One of Calvin's learned and pious cotemporaries was Martin Bucer; who florished A.D. 1520. He says, that "God hath given unto men such a "rite (i.e. baptism), that either by a dipping in, "or washing, or SPRINKLING of water, they might receive remission of sins." †

6 About the middle of the fixteenth century lived the learned, the venerable, the modest Musculus; whose book intitled Loci Communes Sacræ Theologia, contains a rich treasury of pure divinity. In that part of it, wherein he confiders the nature of the facraments in general, and of baptism in particular, he fays, respecting the mode, " As to the dipping of infants, we judge that " this is not fo effential, as that the church may " not be free to baptize either by immersion or " SPRINKLING. That this liberty was observed " in the churches, you may fee in Augustin De " Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus, Cap. lxxiv. The person " to be baptized, fays he (Augustin), confesses his " faith, &c. and after confession, he is either SPRIN-" KLED with water, or dipped in it. And Cyprian, " Book iv. Epist 7, to Magnus, defends the use " of SPRINKLING in baptism." *- In this memorable passage three things must naturally strike the attentive reader. (1) Musculus discards the effentiality of dipping, and equally admits sprinkling. (2) He carries up his appeal to antiquity in vindication of this mode, as far as to the fifth century. (3) Musculus's quotation from Augustin, and reference to the opinion of Cyprian, demonflrate, that fprinkling with water in baptism was practifed in the church, and particularly vindicated by these two great men. And, I should imagine, to every person of judgment and candor, the unanimous opinion of this venerable triumvirate would carry as much weight, as the objections of all the Anabaptists in the world.

Thus have I laid before the reader, a few out of the many extracts that might be made from antiquity, to prove that other modes of dispensing baptism, besides that of dipping, are neither so modern, nor fo spurious as our opponents would infinuate. If it be confidered, as a prefumptive argument added to that taken from the fanction of antiquity, that the purest reformed churches, in the prefent day, admit sprinkling or pouring of water as a valid mode of administration; -and that its validity is founded on the extensive fignification of the word βαπίμω;—on the application of it in various inflances, where the fuppofition of immersion would incur the groffest abfurdity; -on the opinions of the most eminent Critics, Lexicographers, and Divines; -- on the analogy between baptismal aspersion or effusion, and the sprinkling of the blood and Spirit of CHRIST in our justification and fanctification :on the various testimonies which vindicate this analogical reasoning; -on the memorable concesfions of Dr. Gale; -and that the Dutch Anabaptists themselves practise assusion: -- I say, if these things be candidly and impartially confidered, the reader will eafily perceive, with what degree of truth or candor Dr. S. can affirm, that "in con-" tending for immersion, he contends, not for a " particular mode, but for baptism itself." A contention this, however honeftly intended, which is declarative of the spirit of a party, and must be carried on by the united interests of bigotry and fchifm.-A contention, which will ever characterize the unamiable spirit of Anabaptism, and fpread discord through the united assemblies of God's people.-A contention, not likely to redound to the honor of GoD; not calculated to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; nor to administer to the spiritual prosperity of the contenders themselves.—A contention more worthy of the fons of strife, or the narrow bigots, that diffeminated the tares of judaism and legality in the church of Galatia, than of perfons professing a veneration for the gospel of peace.-And a contention, which we defy its maintainers to support by truth, and fair criticism.

The Anabaptists insist much on the refemblance between immersion and the burial of Chrit; which they found upon the figurative language of the Apostle in Rom. vi. 3, 4.* Supposing that passage

[&]quot;A Mr. Sandys, whom I have had occasion to introduce, now and then, in conjunction with his twin-brother in controversy, Parmenas the Deacon; in p. 44, of his bit of title-page mimicry, confronts us with a few authorities in favor of dipping. The first is that of Piscator. Whether our author's translation of the passage from that learned man, is taken immediately from Piscator's original work; or whether he has borrowed it from some of his brethren; it is impossible for me to determine. This, however, almost any reader, who will consult the passage, may determine; viz. that the translator, has given us a fentence without a principal verb, which makes Piscator speak such nonsense, as even in a school-boy, would deserve the lash. Nor is he more accurate in his translation from Gretius; when he informs us, that the antient practice of immersion appears from "the places cause for its admi-

passage does allude to their peculiar mode; our practice is supported by a no less fignificant analogy. For the pouring of water is emblematical of the effusion of the Redeemer's blood, and the pouring out of his foul in death: the head, the principal part of the subject, is put under water, when the element is poured on it: and the taking up and delivering the child to his parents or offerers, is figurative of Christ's refurrection. And the allusion of circumstances in this mode of baptism, is as fignificant, and commemorative to all the purposes of a facrament, as the breaking of bread and pouring out of wine is fymbolical of the facrificed body and blood of CHRIST. The principal difference between us and the Anabaptists, is; they baptize the head and shoulders, and we the face: they ascribe essentiality to their

" nistration." P. 45 .- But he cannot quote a passage, made correct to his hand, without blundering. In p. 44, he uses, and introduces me as using, the term " literal crucific tion," and again, " literal crucific tion." Now, if fuch a word as crucific rion can be found in any part of my pamphlet refered to, I will even fubmit to have the whole configned to the flames; or, if fuch a word can be produced from any lexicographer antient or modern, our quoter's warrant for using it, shall be admitted. Indeed, it feems fome fmall alleviation of Mr. S.'s blunder, that the substantive in question, does not occur in his Bible. But surely it does, in his spelling-dictionary. And, if he think it beneath him to confult that; yet he might know that there is a wide difference between fiction and fixion. And, if this obvious distinction be not sufficient to aid his "critical acumen," I would advise him to look into his Latin-dictionary for the words fingo and figo; and to mark the participles arising respectively from each. And if this mode of investigating the import of English derivatives be not fusficient to fix his standard of orthography, and to help him to write better in future, I give him up, as an incorrigible ignoramus; that affelts to be converfant in the branches of literature, and yet abounds in folceisms, when he makes patch-work in English, as well as in Latin and Greek.

Having lost fight of Mr. M. for feveral pages back, it is fit I thould face him again, before I give him a valedictory falutation. I would fondly hope, that, upon a calm review of the arguments and authorities laid before him in the preceding sheets, he will not in future, decide so peremptorily or fo hastily again, upon a subject, which I am perfuaded, he has not maturely confidered; and which his very superficial acquaintance with literature by no means qualifies him accurately to discuss. If a Gill, a Stennett, a Gifford, or a Ryland, were to declare from the pulpit "that "Pædobaptists never have yet proved their prac-" tice from the word of GoD;" though we should effeem the declaration neither the more candid. nor the truer, for the fanction of these respectable names; yet it would come with fome tolerable grace from men conversant in the branches of literature, and would therefore abate confiderably of its offensiveness. But when we consider that the person, who issued out the attested dogma, is-Mr. Medley; our difgust is excited in proportion to the views we have of the circumscribed abilities of the dogmatist himself. That he is, as Cicero fays, literis tinctus;—has a sprinkling of learning; we acknowledge. But a man who can exhibit criticisms, and give challenges, ought to be literis immersus, buried in the depths of science. And then, if amidst his profound disquisitions, he should at any time shoot an unguarded bolt, as Dr. Gill did, did, when he called Infant-baptism "a pillar of "Popery;" we should be disposed to make all proper allowance for the expressions of human frailty, even in the greatest men; upon the same principle that the Roman Satirist winked, when Homer nodded.

- Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus!

But when an author possesses only a literary tinction; to substitute mere affirmation for argument, and to palm upon the public a few trite and incoherent strictures as so many appeals to the laws of fair criticism; is absolutely inexcufable in-Mr. Medley.

If I might be permitted to give Mr. M. a little advice, I would propose it under the following heads. (1) As a preacher, I would earneftly recommend to him modesty and gravity. The one will inspire his ministrations with a becoming felf-diffidence, which is a most amiable endowment in a public fpeaker: and the other will instil into his mind that folemnity, which when carried into an ordinance, will folemnize the hearers, and give to every means of grace the appearance of an awful intercourse with heaven: while the happy blending of both will be no fmall recommendation of the fentiments he wishes to inculcate. (2) Whenever Mr. M. finds himfelf disposed to rally what he falfly calls a " human " invention;" and to fneer at Pædobaptists, as only "baptizers of the ends of their fingers;" in order to check the current of his irreverent and Nn jocular jocular ideas, I would advise him previously to confider three things; viz. First; What he is himself; -a fallible man, liable to err; and therefore under an obligation of making the most candid and modest allowance for the fallibility of others. Secondly; before whom he is to speak; not only before a promifcuous auditory in which there may be fome, who would feel fenfible difgust at every degree of levity, which tends to the profanation of an ordinance; but likewife before that God, who must be ferved with fear, and before whom, we should even rejoice with reverence. Thirdly; of whom he is to speak; -of those, who are his brethren, and therefore to be treated with tenderness; - of the purest reformed churches upon earth, and therefore to be mentioned with deference;—of thousands of illustrious ministers, martyrs, &c. who have most extensively disseminated the gospel of Christ, and sealed the truth with their blood, and yet were advocates for what our Anabaptist calls a "human " invention; -and of multitudes, who, for learning and piety are as much our author's fuperiors, as a cedar of Lebanon out-strips a bramble. (3) As Mr. M. has given us a promissory note, that, if ever he comes to Shrewsbury again, he will exhibit in the character of "a severe opposer;" let me request him to take care, that his opposition is conducted with that meekness, solemnity and moderation, which characterize a man, influenced more by a zeal for the glory of God, than by a party-spirit: and that his "feverity" is that of folid folid argument, and not of low witticism. For if Mr. M. is "fevere" in the style he lately adopted, he must expect that others will level at him the severity of retaliating censure, if not, of cutting farcasm. (4) If he appears again in quality of an author; I would advise him not to indulge those abusive fallies that have decorated his late performance; particularly, that he would fpeak a little more honorably of the Church of England. (5) That he would not listen to the invitations of the twin-disputants, should they solicit his attendance at a future baptization; but infift upon their making humble application on that head to their brother in disgrace. Why should Mr. M. be accessary to the fomenting a division, which, it feems, principally originated from the touchiness of poor Parmenas, and which must be kept up to gratify the pomp and whim of this inflammable Deacon? I know it is written " the fpirit of the " prophets is subject to the prophets:" but I never remember it recorded in any part of facred writ, that " the spirit of the prophets is subject to dea-" cons." Do then, Sir, if you would act the part of impartiality, infift, that the Deacon should make some overtures towards a reconciliation. As you feem to have confiderable weight with his fide of the question, propose the mode; and who knows, how far your earnest and impartial interference may fucceed in producing a lafting coalition between your divided brethren? I really am ferious: infomuch that if no other end is answered by this pamphlet, I shall think N n 2 it it a compensation, in a great measure, for the pains I have taken in this reiterated remonstrance. But, I repeat it again, you should begin with Parmenas. As he has been a primum-mobile in the division; so he should, in the healing of it. Sethim a going, therefore; and probably you will fucceed. I am perfuaded, a positive injunction transmitted to him on this head, will do him good: but an actual fubmission to it, much more. He can write addresses. Suppose he were to pen a conciliatory address upon the present occasion. For, if he could suppose that his late one, would engage the fentiments and determine the conduct of the "Baptist-church, meeting in "High-street, Shrewsbury;" is there not equal ground for a supposition, that a reconciliation proposed and begun by the Deacon, would be punctually attended to, and literally imitated, by the feveral members arranged under his Deacon-Jhip? If he can be prevailed on to write this conciliatory address; and to take the other neceffary step, which I have already suggested; I shall entertain a more favorable opinion of him, than hitherto. (6) If you should make another visit to this town; instead of exhibiting as a "fevere opposer" of shose, who merit no such illiberal opposition at your hands; I would advife you to come with a rod to your own party, and rebuke them sharply for that unhappy spirit of schism, which has occasioned, and still keeps up, a rent in their communion. And pray, remember, that Parmenas will require not the gentlest frokes ftrokes of your ministerial rod. Level your first rebuke at him from the former clause of Rom. xvi. 17; the second from i. Tim. v. 1; your third from i. Theff. v. 14; your fourth from Col. iii. 25; and fo on, according as you may fee fit to accommodate your textuary chastisements to the particular branches of his misdemeanor. And, if you should think it necessary to give him forty stripes save one; remember, I prescribe no other stripes, but a few plain texts of scripture, urged in well-adapted application. I have been fo unfuccessful in my addresses to P. upon all subjects, that I now give him up; and therefore wish to confign this incorrigible pupil to the care of Mr. M. as to that of a more able disciplinarian. I heartily wish he may improve under his pastoral rod: because, as for his more immediate teacher, and auxiliary, Mr. S. he only encourages him in his follies; reads his splenetic and filly address in a public ordinance; helps him to quote authors he never read; puffs him off in his " immense stores of classical treasure;" joins with him in his difingenuities; and even decorates his blunders and paralogifms with glittering encomiums. Since therefore, this Anabaptist probationer is not likely to be of any real fervice to the Deacon, but rather, to administer oil to the peculiar inflammability of P.'s disposition; I wish Mr. M. would connect them both in a little falutary discipline; and thereby point out to them fuch conduct as is worthy of their their respective functions.* And, in order to complete your earnest efforts for peace, address the divided parties, as Paul did the contentious malecontents of Corinth; "Ye are yet carnal: " for whereas there is among you envying and " firife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk " as men?" i. Cor. iii. 3. Surely, Sir, before you arraign your Pædobaptist brethren, and condemn their principles under the false epithet of " human invention;" you should first labor to " purge out from among" your own party "the leaven" of STRIFE: and if you come hither to any purpose, it should be as a " severe " opposer" of that wisdom which is from beneath; which discovers its devilish nature as much in bitter contentions, as in earthly-mindedness and gross sensuality. Men may profess evangelical principles, and yet possess carnal hearts. They may most dreadfully deceive themselves under a specious profession of a system; and, while they name the name of CHRIST, may not depart from iniquity. I dare not affirm that this is absolutely the case with your brethren in this town: but, as a wife phyfician, would suspect some dangerous malady lurking in the conflitution, from certain unfavorable fymptoms in the pulse, &c. and would adapt his prescriptions accordingly: fo, Sir, I would advise you, as a skilful and impartial physician, to suspect that all is not quite right, where the pulse of patsion beats so high, and the fever of contention suggests practices, diametrically opposite to the mild and pacific genius of true christianity. If you would make a radical cure, strike at the root of bitterness: and though the operation may give the patients pain, yet spare not. Remember Paul's words, " If I yet pleased men I should not be the fer-" vant of Christ." Gal. i. 10. Make them feel the keen deep fearchings of the fcripture-probe, from that awful passage in Mat. xviii. 34, 35. And, so after the latent gangrene is difcovered, is probed, and is radically healed; they will blefs the hand of the operator, though it gave them pain: for "he that reproveth a " man, shall afterwards find more favor, than he " that flattereth with his lips."

^{*} It would not be amis, likewise, particularly to recommend it to Mr. Sandys, that in the next edition of his late wonderful piece of patchwork, he would oblige his unlearned readers, with a translation of his "immense stores of classical treasure;" or else publish them with an index expurgatorius: that instead of writing, as if he brought his literary patches from the magazine of mottos in the Spectators, Tatlers, &c. he would content himself with his own mother-tongue, with which I am sure he is best acquainted: and at least, whenever he says again, that he "meant not to be tedious," or "was going to be serious," we request, he would not tell us such trisses in beroic verse. Ordinary readers will never be able to follow him in such literary soarings; unless he include them with the same happy wings, that elevate his own genius, or rather, with the same happy wings, that elevate his own genius, or rather, with the same borrowed string, by which his paper-kite has been suspended in the air, so high.

And now, Sir, count me not an enemy, because I tell you the truth. You came to Shrewsbury, as a "fevere opposer" of Pædobaptism. But you mistook your errand. You should have come as a "fevere opposer" of the strife and bigotry of your brethren: And before you cast a flone at another church, you should have healed the fcandalous divisions of your own. To difcover the mote in the eye of others, and to overlook the beam in that of your brethren, is fuchan inftance of partial connivance, as can only be accounted for, on a supposition of prejudice groffly misapplied. Think not these hints proceed from any indignant pique at you, or your brethren. Indeed they do not. If I know any thing of my own heart, I would not entertain any thing towards the worst among them, but benevolence and love. And even, while I am this moment exposing the impropriety of your own ministerial conduct, and telling you plainly of the many aggravations wherewith it is marked; my heart meditates the fincerest affection for you, and every man of your denomination upon earth, that preaches the gospel of CHRIST: and in that view, as far as you publish it without legal adulterations, exhibitions of felf, and mixture of irreverent and uncharitable bigotry, you have my repeated withes for abundant fuccefs.

C H A P. VIII.

The several extraordinary specimens of Mr. Turner's MANNER, CHARITY, and LOGICAL REASON-ING, considered.—The falshood, futility, and malevolence of all his Remarks, exposed.—His criticisms, respecting the mode and subjects of baptism, proved to be nugatory and inconclusive.—The instances of uncharitable judging, scattered through his pamphlet, declarative of the true spirit of a red-hot Anabaptist.

Am not in the least surprised, that the author of "Remarks on a Letter to a Baptist-Minister," should lay a positive injunction on his printer, to keep his name a profound fecret, as well from the friends, as foes of Anabaptism; that he should fuppress his very initials; and that, in order to preclude the possibility of conjecture, he should not even favor us with any epistolary date, by the locality of which, we might at least know our anonymous author's place of abode.-I fay, I am not furprifed, the remarker should adopt such a variety of well-guarded modes of felf-concealment. For, as he might entertain fome fecret mifgivings, that his pamphlet was calculated to bring upon him the cenfure of the candid and judicious, 00 judicious, as well as expose him to a mortifying reply from his opponent; timid prudence might suggest the necessity of eluding, as much as possible, the force of both, by taking resuge in the dark cells of feereey. From hence, should he send forth any arrows pointed with malevolence, and should an antagonist wish to take up the gauntlet; the occult situation of the remarker would screen him from a personal attack, and enable him to sleep in a whole skin, behind his anonymous rampart as—NO-BODY.

However, notwithstanding the printer's inviolate fidelity to the remarker's injunctions, and notwithstanding the studied privacy, wherewith the anonymous publication hath fole upon the public; yet, fuch are its diffinguithing features, that fonth positively affirm, they characterize a warm Anabaptist; and that that Anabaptist is Mr. Turner, of Birmingham. I am informed (for I have no personal knowledge of Mr. T.) that there is a great peculiarity in the spirit and manner of that gentleman, with which the contents of the "Remarks" exactly correspond; fo that, as the correspondent features of the production decypher the parent; it is from this homogeneous affinity, that my friends unanimoufly agree in confining the likeness to Mr. T. though indeed it might, as to its general outlines, be accommodated to others of his brethren.

When I first read over Mr. Turner's "Remarks," I almost despaired of being ever able to make any reply; not because they contain any invincible cible arguments, or exhibit any unanswerable criticisms; but because, the author, besides obferving very little decency, has paid no fort of attention to order. His thoughts are fo loofe, defultory, and unconnected throughout, that to reduce them to any methodical arrangement, is, like collecting together the scattered oracular leaves of the Sybil, almost next to an impossibileaves of the syott, almost next to an impossibility. Mr. T. has indeed ingenuously acknowledged, p. 22; that, "he has observed very "little order." But this acknowledgment will by no means atone for the prodigious trouble he has given me, in methodizing his disorderly performance; nor will the public be inclined to accept of it, as a fufficient apology for such glaring deviations from the rules of authorship. A great reasoner has observed, that "incohæren-" cies in matter, and suppositions without proofs, " put handsomely together, are apt to pass for strong reason." But the "Remarks," besides abounding with incoharencies, and suppositions devoid of proof, possess the additional disadvantage of being put unhandsomely together. The remarker attempts, indeed, a few manœuvres as a controvertift; but they are all random-shots. Like the evolutions of undifciplined recruits, they do no execution; but refemble more the feeble efforts of the pop-gun, than the methodical volley of well-regulated ordnance.—Sometimes the remarker, with vast parade, erects his battery, and prepares for a serious cannonading: but, as if confcious that his artillery was inadequate to the O 0 2 impor-important work, he unexpectedly defifts, and flies off to some fresh manœuvre. He farts an argument, without ever ftating it .- At other times, he shouts victory, without so much as founding a prelude to the battle: his imaginary triumphs are generally founded on the use of a certain piece of easy artillery, peculiar to the self-confident dogmatist, and very well known by the name of—ipse dixit. And such are, at all times, his fudden transitions, volatile remarks, nugatory arguments, incohærent strictures, and inconclufive logic; that, if I were to purfue the fame track, I should look upon myself as writing, with a defign to amuse, not edify. And when I confider, how I am obliged to follow the remarker through his various immethodical shiftings, I am naturally reminded of an excellent observation of Mr. Addison. "The answering of " an immethodical author is like the hunting of a " duck: when you have him full in your fight, " he gives you the flip, and becomes invisible."

However, if the want of methodical arrangement were the only blemish in the remarker's pamphlet, my complaints might be reduced to a comparatively small compass. But, besides being more immethodical than any author, I ever read, he almost constantly transgresses the laws of candor, and christian decorum; while a total want of temper often betrays him into very indecent language, and extremely uncharitable sentiments. For my own part, so little has Mr. T. appeared to me, to write like a person calmly invesinvestigating truth; that his whole performance feems rather to resemble the angry essusions of a reader, giving vent to his indignation in such terms, as the paroxysm of his passion might suggest; while the incohærency of the whole would almost incline one to suppose, that some shorthand writer, took down, and published the remarker's thoughts, just as they dropped ex tempore from his lips, rudis indigestaque moles.—But that the candid reader may see, I do not misrepresent Mr. T. I will lay before him the ground of my charges, in those specimens, Mr. T. has given us of his manner, modesty, charity, and logical reasoning.

I. I As to Mr. T.s MANNER, the judicious reader will eafily percieve it runs through his whole performance, and gives it a very diffinguishable cast; whereby our author might be known from a thousand others. As a specimen of his manner, in fabricating delicate fimiles, we need look no farther than page 1; where our curious fimilift compares the controverfy about baptism to "the " vain jangling of porters over a pot of beer." I acknowledge this is a most porterly comparison; and may, with great propriety, be accommodated to the dialect of the coarse tribe, whose language fwells, and whose ideas are refined, in proportion to the quantity of liquor they imbibe. But how fuch very LUSTY dialect should be adopted by one, who, I am fure, is not a porter; and by one too, who wishes to correct the uncouth current of our ideas; appears to me rather mysterious. 2 Another

2. Another sample of the remarker's extraordinary delicacy in applying fimiles, and framing comparisons, may be seen in page 9. After starting an hypothesis, which has nothing for its support, but his round affirmation; he draws a dogmatical conclusion, and suggests the following brilliant comparison; "Has it not been said, " that the greatest thief will cry thief first?" How extremely delicate! When Mr. Turner, compared us to porters, I thought his fimile defcended as low, as even VULGARITY ITSELF could fink it. But, behold the amazing fertility of his imagination! The comparison drops us fill lower; till, by the magical power of the remarker's invention, what was before the jangling of a porter, now terminates in the knavery of a thief. Well, I do affure Mr. T. that, although he has represented me as the "greatest thief;" there are two things which I desire never to steal from him; and these are, his spirit and METHOD of writing. I cannot help adopting a wish, that the remarker himself would, Deucalion-like, steal a little fire of folid argument from the writings of the judicious friends of truth. For, till he has committed fome innocent depredation of this kind, the genius of his productions will only remind me of the Gracian statuary; who, after finithing and reviewing an image of stone, thus addressed the unanimated figure, " Δει δε τι " ενδιν εινωι." * The want of conclusive argument, apposite illustration, and spirited diction, is an effential deficiency in writing, which all the little fimiles, or low vulgarifms in the world, will never supply. And, how Mr. T. should imagine that the latter would be a fatisfactory substitute for the former, "is" (to use his own words) "beyond measure wonderful!"

3. It is no fmall peculiarity in our author's manner, that it is overloaded, with a prodigious number, though with no very great variety, of positive assertions, void of demonstration. This mode of writing, however, is just as convenient, as it is superficial; for, it saves trouble-of reasoning. And I must do Mr. T. the justice, to:acknowledge, that he fcems perfectly conversant in this kind of dogmatic phraseology. Sometimes the reader's expectations are raifed, as if the remarker would purfue a chain of folid argumentation, and establish his point by scripture and reason: when lo! all of a sudden, our hopes are blafted, and nothing decides the controversy, but fuch facil logic as, " I verily BELIEVE-" nay I will go farther and ROUNDLY AFFIRM, "that I am sure of it—I believe I might fafely TAKE MY OATH OF it—UNDOUBTEDLY infantbaptism cannot be right. Surely believers' baptism MUST be right.—Not a syllable, jot, or tittle, is to be met with to their (the " Pædobaptists') purpose. Infant-baptisin can " NEVER be proved .- Your spirit will UN-" DOUBTEDLY give your readers an indifferent " idea of you. -- I can Assure-you from UN-"DOUBTED authority, &c .- Something peculiarly

" arly uncommon must certainly have stirred up your, &c.—I will venture to say, you will wish you never had done so. I am po" sitive there are a feries of things before you, &c."

Such are, very frequently, the modest declarations, and such the weighty arguments, which ornament the remarker's thoughts, respecting the present debate. And I humbly ask the candid reader, if the picture, which the judicious Dr. Watts draws of the dogmatist, does not, in several of its features, correspond with those of the remarker. "He (the dogmatist) believes all his opinions with the same assurance, that he does a mathematical truth. He has scarce any mere probabilities that belong to him: every thing with him, is certain and infallible.—Persons of this temper are seldom to be convinced of any mistake."*

4 But I must not omit one instance of the remarker's positivity, which outshines all the rest. So fully persuaded is he, that Christ, the Apostle of the Gentiles, and "all the ministers" and churches of that glorious day" were Anabaptists; that he says, "Do I utter forgeries and "falsities when I call St. Paul a Baptist-minister?" No. I do not. If he was not; what denomination was he of? You can't say he was a "Church of-England minister.—Indeed Sir, it is in my power to say (and behold before God I "lye not!) that Jesus Christ himself was "A Baptist-minister."

I beg leave to make a few remarks on this curious passinge. (1) In order to prove that Paul was an Anabaptist, Mr. T. should have previously demonstrated, that he baptized adults only; and that he rebaptized fuch as had been baptized in infancy. 'Till the remarker has given us fcriptural proof for these two particulars, (which I defy him to do) we shall only look upon his attempt, to make Paul an Anabaptist, as refembling that of the Roman Catholic, who afferted, that the apostle was a Papist. (2) When a member of the Anabaptist denomination, wants to make a monopoly of the chief of apostles, to the exclusion of the claim of other reformed churches, which manifestly adhere to Paul's form of found words; he gives us a most fad specimen of his total want of Catholicism. (3) That "it is in "Mr. T.'s power to say, that Jesus Christ was a Baptist minister" we readily allow. But, how does this gentleman prove his affertion? Why, much in the same manner, that he does his other marvellous positions; viz. "Yes, my friend, " he most certainly was!" This is the argumentum palmarium; this, the mighty engine, which is to demolish, at one stroke, all the argumentative batteries of Pædobaptists. Who can stand before Mr. T.'s MOST CERTAINLY? This is the judge that ends the strife; the grand instrument of decision.

Equally unguarded and precipitate is the remarker, in faying, that "I want to fix the date "of the origin of Baptisin and the Baptists, a few P p "fcores

" fcores of years ago." This is a manifest misrepresentation. Scriptural baptism, I affert, is of apostolic antiquity; but Anabaptism is a mere German novelty. The tenor of the debate, therefore, does not respect the origin of baptism, or Baptists in general; but the rife of Anabaptists, and the commencement of their unscriptural opposition to infant-baptism; which was first hatched by a spurious feet of the Albigenfes; was furiously propagated by the German Ranters: received confiderable increase under the fostering hand of tyrannical usurpation; and is still carried on with vehement zeal by modern Anabaptists, in defiance of scripture, reason, and the general voice of antiquity. And, though our author is pleased, according to his delicate flyle, to call the Church of England "a new " affair, newly come up;" yet I would beg leave to inform him, that this fame " new affair," is much older than English Anabaptism; that it "came up" from the pit of Popith darkness to the regions of light and liberty, without the least helping hand from Anabaptists; that the Reformers, the renowned instruments in bringing up, and establishing, this " new affair," were, to a man, advocates for Infant-baptifin; and, that the glorious fystem of the gospel was established in our excellent Church, long before Anabaptism had an existence in Britain. This I have endeavored to prove, in my Letter to a Battist-minister. Let the remarker disprove it, if he can.

Thus have I gleaned together a few instances of Mr. T.'s manner. If I were to produce all the specimens of like fort, scattered up and down in the remarker's pamphlet, they would exhibit a very plentiful crop indeed; luxuriant with delicate illustrations, and brilliant fimiles, which display the prodigious polithing of our author's flyle, and the extraordinary elegance of his fentiment. And, if the reader thinks proper, to take a little dogmatical effrontery for folid reafoning; a few unmeaning appeals to heaven, as a substitute for scriptural demonstration; and a multitude of round affirmations, undoubtedlys, most certainlys, furelys, &c. &c. as equivalent to decifive argumentation; I can affure him, that England cannot produce a more redoubtable logician; than our remarker. But, if the judicious reader has too much penetration, not to difcern the weakness of the disputant's cause under the fallacious mode he adopts; and too much steadiness, to be frightened into Anabaptism, even tho' its warm abettor should fay, " behold, before "God I lye not;" should he perceive, that such folemn affeverations, are only fo many poor apologies for most certain mistakes; I beg the judicious observer will please to recollect the remarker's own words. "A bad cause can never be " defended with good arguments."

5 Although I may have fufficiently tried the reader's patience already, by dwelling so long upon the instances of Mr. T.'s manner; yet I hope he will bear with me, while I engage his P p 2 attention attention a little longer, to so barren a subject. The remarker seems to possess an uncommon fondness for introducing little stories, where he should have favored his readers with arguments. Thefe ftories answer the same important purpose, that his round affirmations do, upon other occasions .-They help him out at a dead lift. In p. 26, he heaps together no less than three in a breath; all, in the flory-teller's own estimation, very much to the purpose, no doubt. One curious anecdote, in particular, is concerning " a mi-" nister, who declared he would have rode his " horse a hundred miles, to have found one text " of scripture to prove Infant-baptism." The perfon, who labored under this great difficulty, was, it feems, once "a rigid Pædobaptist." Without contending, whether the rigidity of this gentleman may not be as great, fince he has commenced a proselyte to Anabaptism, as before; or how far it may have formerly kept pace with his folidity: I cannot help expressing my concern that he should propose "doing some GREAT "THING" in order to remove his doubts; when, only a look into his Bible would fave the man and the poor beast fuch a long journey, at any time.

The most extraordinary flory which the remarker gives us, in p. 38,* (For a story I can prove

^{*} In order to fave appearances, this should have made the fourth story in the just-cited page 26. But I recollect that Mr. Addison says, "Answering an immethodical writer is like hunting a duck." Therefore, if the Remarker, as a story-teller, pops under water, and, like an immerging duck, becomes invisible for a full dozen of pages; I hope the want of method will not be attributed to the hunter, but to the hunted.

it to be) refpects an Irish Nobleman; whose very late decease has spread general concern throughout the whole circle of his furviving friends. As our Anabaptist seems fond of nobility to give fanction to his peculiarities, he therefore is delighted with the prefent opportunity; fo favorable, fince the fubject is incapable of anfwering for himfelf. Accordingly he has the confummate modesty to affert, that the late Lord Kinsale "was a Baptist, and a member of a " Baptist-church, in the South of Britain." But against this groundless piece of intelligence, I have authority to declare, from one of his nearest furviving relatives, that the whole of this flory is a fabrication of falshood and impertinence. And even if his Lordship had been "a " Baptist", what argument, in the name of wonder, would our author deduce from that circumstance? And Icappeal to the judicious reader, whether the lugging the name of a deceased Nobleman into our author's pamphlet, is not an instance of consummate ill-breeding and palpable rudeness.

6 One story more, and I have done with the remarker, as a story-teller.—P. I, he informs us of "a controversy between Russen and Stennett; "the former of whom, threw out some scanda-" lous hints respecting Mr. Keach's character;" from which he (Mr. Keach) was vindicated by the testimonium of several persons, who attested his innocence, and rescued his character from the rude aspersions of Mr. Russen. The design of Mr. Turner, in embellishing the first page of his Remarks with this mal-apropos story appears from the use he makes of it in the following words. "I am forry to see such a femblance be-" tween David Russen's book and Mr. De Courcy's." P. 2. As I was not conscious of having thrown out any thing that deserved in any degree to be styled "fcandalous hints" respecting Mr. Medley, or any other Anabaptist; I therefore purchased Mr. Stennett's Reply to Russen, that I might fee to what species of imputation the remarker 'refered under the term " scandalous hints." I was not a little furprised to find that Russen's charge against Mr. Keach, was that of —-uncleanness! How was my aftonithment excited upon this difcovery! when I confidered that the remarker declares from his "very foul that there is fuch a "' 'femblance" between my book, and that which contained the above scandalous infinuation!-What! Sir, did I ever advance a charge of uncleanness against Mr. M? Does my pamphlet contain the most distant hint of any fuch imputation? Have I not borne a favorable testimony to the character of my opponent, by ranking him with his brethren, whom (in p. 37, of my Letter to a Baptist-minister), I have flyled "a very " respectable body of Protestant-dissenters?" Have I not, in p. 7, of the same pamphlet, declared that " I esteem Mr. M. and other respectable " persons in his connexion, with the greatest " fincerity?" Would I fay this, if I did not think him a man of piety? whose character as 2 minister minister of the gospel, is free from the foul misdemeanor of which Russen injuriously and falfly accused the pious Mr. Keach? i appeal to Mr. Turner's conscience, therefore, whether by declaring there is "a 'femblance" between Russen's book and mine, and by specifying the obnoxious particular which disgraced R.'s performance, he (the remarker) has not virtually charged me with "having thrown out scandalous. " hints, respecting Mr. M.'s character:" and thereby indirectly published to the world a most invidious and groundless falshood. The readerwill perhaps candidly apologize for this instance of precipitancy in Mr. T. by attributing it to the prodigious fondness he seems to discover for storytelling: an apology I am disposed to admit, supposing that term to be equivocal. But, how this gentleman, who, so readily intitles the productions of others, "defamatory performances," will be able to rescue his own from a "'semblance" to defamation, in the prefent striking instance. I am at a loss to find out.

But, perhaps Mr. T. would infinuate that the 'semblance, (as by an unmeaning apostrophe he is pleased to call it) between Russen's book and mine, appears in the general strain of both: and I thould not wonder if he should attempt in future to elude the charge of mifrepresentation and falshood, by flying to this evafive subterfuge. But, if he supposed the 'semblance to respect only the subject of both in general; why did he industriously expatiate on the circumstance of Russen's "feandalous hints" in particular? Would not any common reader conclude, after perusing this anecdote of seandal, and seeing a parallel between the author of it and me immediately following, that in my animadversions on Mr. M.'s conduct, I had exactly imitated Russen's "fean-" dalous hints?" And, as he was conscious that in this respect the 'semblance was no 'semblance at all; why did he not honestly undeceive his readers? How could he conscientiously introduce an anecdote, between the allusion of which and the contents of my pamphlet, there is as great a 'semblance, as between the remarker and a man of modesty and candor?

But that there is not fo striking a likeness between Russen's book and mine, as the remarker would falsly infinuate, will appear, if we take a cursory view of some of R.'s capital charges against Anabaptists. (1) The first is that of Arianism, in the following rude terms. "These heretics divide the Trinity; are in profession Arians." Does my pamphlet contain any such imputation as this? (2) Speaking of their origin the same rude author says, "Base-born brats love" not to hear of their parentage." P. 8. (3) He charged them with countenancing "she-prophet-"esses," as he styles semale-preachers. P. 196. (4) With admitting divorces, where the parties differed respecting Anbaptism. P. 204. (5) He represents them as "Manichees and Jesuits, in that

"they reject magistracy among Christians." P. 219. (6) The charge of Quakerism is brought against them, as "disowning the administration" of oaths." Ibid. (7) He exhibits them as a fet of uncharitable damners of their brethren, and fays, "the black book of damnation is open-" ed against all who are not of their way." P. 233.
(8) "Anabaptism" he deems "a mortal poison." Ibid. (9) He paints the Anabaptists as so many bloody incendiaries; adding, "Good LORD de-" liver us from a drawn fword in the hand of " a rampant Anabaptist." P. 248. (10) He calls their ministers a fet of "illiterate fellows, who, " from mechanics of the lowest rank were made " priests of the high-places, before they knew " what a Lexicon was." P. 115. (11) He charges them with being Sabbatarians, or observers of the abolished sabbath of the Jews.* (12) He represents them as practising the extreme unction of Papists. "Let us look into their end" says Russen, " and bring them to their grave: and here, like " Papists, at the last hour they use extreme unc-"tion." † P. 204. (13) He gives the finishing froke to all his accusations, by saying, "Satan Qq" has

^{*} This charge, however, happens to be just, and ad hominem. For, Mr. Stennett, in page 228, of his Reslexions, not only admits it respecting some of his brethren, but also says, "I do not scruple to acknow-"ledge MYSELF one of those" (fabbatarisms) "who account it" (the seventh-day sabbath) "Good."

[†] Mr. Stennett says, in the above-cited page of his Reslexions, "'Tis' true, some of them ARE of the mind, that this rule, James v. is "yet obligatory." A strange notion of Anabaptists this, to suppose a custom to be still in sorce, when the occasions of miracle, to which it refered, have ccased. Let it be observed, however, that Russen has fcarce broached a herefy in the church " for those seventeen hundred years but some of " them have licked it up." P. 211. And again; " Here is a goodly bead-roll of herefies, which if " I strung 'em upon an Anabaptistical cat-gut, " are like to make a fine ornament for a Chrif-

" tian. P. 230,

Thus have I, not without a little trouble, collected together feveral specimens of Mr. Russen's phraseology, as well as heavy accusations against the Anabaptists of his day. My obvious design in doing this, is, that the reader may determine, with what degree of justice Mr. Turner of Birmingham, has declared to the world, "there is " fuch a 'semblance between David Russen's book " and mine," either as to the style of the former in general, or the obnoxious anecdote which uthers in our 'femblance-maker's comparison in particular. Had Mr. T. infinuated this merely upon the strength of information, in which case there might be a degree of pardonable mistake, I should have taken little notice of his 'semblance, or of the fabricator of it. But when I confider, that he had an opportunity of revising both performances, and must have had ocular demonfiration of the evident contrast between both, (of which I hope the reader has had fatisfactory evidence); is not his conduct peculiarly aggravated?

Ruffen mifrepresented the practice of Anabaptists, by charging them with holding the extreme unction of the Papists, when they only anointed their fick as a probable mean of their recovery. That they were chargeable with an abfurdity, is evident; but not with fo flagrant a one as Ruffen would infinuate.

and can he be fairly acquitted from the fin of bearing false witness against his neighbour? As to his faying that "Russen received the thanks of the "convocation for his defamatory performance," this circumstance is soisted into the narrative, in order to sling a little dirt at our ecclesiastical governors, as if they applauded Russen's performance, because it was defamatory But the reader is to remember that our author is telling a little story; in which he thinks some cotoring is allowable. However, if this branch of it does not come from his pen, in suture, authenticated by better intelligence, than that of his mere affirmation; I assure the remarker, we shall be strongly tempted to point out "a semblance" between him and—fomething which shall be anonymous for the present.

II. Having taken a view of our author's manner, confider we next the effusions of his candor and charity.

I happened to introduce in my Letter to a Baptist-Minister, a quotation from Mr. Wesley's Notes on the New Testament, respecting the probability of John's baptizing his numerous profelytes in Jordan, not by immersion, but by pouring of water. This circumstance, which to every man of candor would appear perfectly inosfensive, greatly offends Mr. T. The very name of Mr. Wesley, throws him into such a violent paroxysm of passion, that he seems for a season to lose all command of temper; and this indignant sit so effectually bereaves him of the calm exertion of reason, that, instead of attempting a refutation of the passage taken from Mr. Wesley's notes, he flies off to fuch rudeness of personal invective, as may afford the reader a prefumptive demonstration of the weakness of the remarker's cause. Sallies of abuse, lugged thus preposterously into a controversy, are our author's substitutes for argument. After styling Mr. Wesley an "old, " artful fophister," not content with this gross abuse, he passes sentence upon him, in terms equally illiberal; adding, "Surely never did a " greater sophister handle a pen, or a Bible, or " hung a head over a pulpit." According to the several steps of Mr. T.'s abusive climax, Mr. W. is (1) A sophister. (2) An old sophister. (3) An artful old fophister. (4) The greatest old artful fophister, that ever wrote, or preached. The reader will wonder what provocation Mr. W. has given the remarker, that he should accost him in such indecent language? Why, he has only given his opinion, in a rational comment on Matt. iii. that the multitudes baptized by John were not immersed; and I happened to transcribe the Commentator's words. And is this all the injury, that excited Mr. T.'s indignation? Surely, if any overflowing of passion ever merited the title of asperitas agrestis & inconcinna, this does. And I will not scruple to declare, that I cannot discover either the Christian, the Gentleman, or the Logician, characterized by Mr. T.'s animadversion. -Not the Christian; because, whatever may be our differences on controvertible subjects, the genius genius of true christianity inculcates benevolence and charity towards the persons of dissentient brethren: while the inspired founders of it suppose, that " to judge our brother is to judge " the law, and to speak evil of the law;" and confirmes every decifion on the principle of his conduct and the fate of his person, as equivalent to the unhallowed attempt of usurping the great Legislator's tribunal, and of arrogating the divine prerogative, peculiar to the Searcher-of-hearts. "Who art thou, that judgest another?" A Christian by profession? Then, remember, "to his " own mafter he standeth or falleth." -- Not the Gentleman; because it is by no means characteriffic of fuch an one, to abuse any man in terms fo gross, and unpolite, as those the remarker has applied to Mr. W. and that too, without the finallest provocation on the fide of the party abufed .- Not the Logician; for, by what rule of logic, does Mr. T. demonitrate, that, because Mr. W. thinks the persons mentioned in Mat. iii. were not immersed, he is therefore " an artful old so-" phister?" Should not the remarker have first detected the fophistry of the comment, by dint of fair reasoning, before he arraigned the person of the commentator and condemned him as an "old " sophister?" Since he has not even attempted this; does his conduct here exemplify either the calmness of the Christian, the politeness of the Gentleman, or the endowments of the Scholar?

2 Mr. T. charges us "with taking liberties" with scripture." That is, in other words, he blames us for reasoning on it. What! is scripture contrary to reason? Or do we wrong in exerting that faculty, while we fearch for truth in a facred volume, which is nothing but the mind of HIM who is REASON in infinite perfection?—A narrative is laid before us, in which fcripture is filent as to some circumstantials. How are we to be guided in our refearches in this case? Certainly, by confidering on which fide there is the greatest degree of probability; and by determining our rational inquiry accordingly. Thus, truth is found, where reason preponderates. Apply this to the present case, and it will appear, with how ill a grace the remarker charges us with " taking liberties." - And when he exclaims " What a horrid fcene of things should we have " laid before us!" the horrid scene exists only in his bewildered imagination; the excursions of which refemble more the chimerical fallies of a fick man's dreams, than the calm investigations of truth and candor. People may fancy "hor-" rid scenes," like the philosopher who cried out Videor mihi videre,-&c. but, only cure fuch fanciful folks of the delirium of bigotry, or remove the jaundiced medium of prejudice; and all those scenes instantly drop their horror, and affume the most amiable representations. Besides, we are of opinion that those who take matters upon truft, and are guided by the flights of imagination, or the prepoficitions of bigotry, are more likely to traverte the "horrid fcenes" of wild enthufiasin and uncharitableness, than they whose fentiments are the refult of the calm exertions of right reason. - But our remarker has still more "horrid " fcenes" prefented to his imagination; for his ideas are full of the terrible. Hear him. "It " feems to me" (videor mihi videre; like the dreaming philosopher aforefaid) " that men are " determined, at all events, to contradict the " great and holy GOD to his face!" P. 21. Softly, good Sir. Bona verba, quaso! This is a tremendous charge, indeed! Should not Mr. T. be quite fure, that it is well-grounded? "To " contradict God-the great and holy God-and " to his face;" is fuch a species of affront to: the divine Majesty, as no person would wish to be guilty of, who has the smallest solicitude about his eternal welfare. Yet, this horrid guilt the remarker lays at the door of his brethren. Wherefore? Why, if the reader will only examine the passage, with which the awful charge is connected, he will find, that it is brought against us, only because we draw a rational inference from the most natural supposition. Or, in other words, because we cannot think, confistently with the dictates of reason and common fense, that the vast multitudes alluded to in Mat. iii. were all immersed by John the Baptist; therefore Mr. T. accuses us of being "deter-"mined to contradict God to his face." Reader, which do you think this man is most remarkable for? His logic, or his charity? Perhaps you will think with myfelf, that the scale of his arguments contains an equipoise of each; and that the compound pound of both is lighter than vanity itself. And, as to the charge of "contradicting God," we must attribute the misapplication of it, to the terrisic scenes which Mr. T.'s gloomy imagination paints before his eyes; as well as to a desire of frightening his readers into his peculiarities.

3. The remarker is very angry, because I happened to drop a delicate disapprobation of the proceedings of the Americans, as well as of those publications which vindicate the principle of their rebellious opposition to the Mother-country. As Mr. Fletcher has treated this subject with a most masterly discussion, sounded on scripture, reason, and the nature of our constitution, in his Reply to Mr. Caleb Evans and Dr. Price; and we happen to coincide in opinion respecting this fubject; he therefore comes in for a good large thare of the remarker's abuse. But he pours it forth in that mode of anonymous innuendo, peculiar to cowardly malevolence. He neither mentions his own name, nor that of the person whom he abuses. Thus he inveighs. "Your end, Sir, in " thus doing, I am afraid was none of the best. " Much the fame, I suppose, with that of a " flaming zealot, a neighbor of your's, remarkable "for nothing that I know of, except it be for tedious harangues, &c." P. 24. And does Mr. T. assert that Mr. Fletcher is "remarkable " for nothing, except tedious harangues?" But I think he is remarkable for two particulars, for which the remarker never was, and probably never never will be remarkable; viz. for deep thinking and close reasoning. As to the "end" which Mr. F. or myself had in view, in our unanimous strictures on the principles and practice of American Male-contents; the reader may eafily perceive, our defign was nothing more than to bear a testimony against the false patriotism of the day, while we profess our christian love for the mistaken patriots themselves. Is there any harm in this? Mr. T. thinks there is. For, we cannot differ from our brethren in a punctilio, either with respect to baptism or politics, but the remarker is instantaneously filled with dreadful fuspicions. His imagination feems to be pregnant with views of more "horrid scenes" still. He even infinuates, that we with to have him and his brethren treated with marks of ignominy and perfecution, similar to what the Papists exercised towards John Huss. "Happy is it for us, that we are not afraid of any ill effects " from his pen or yours. Happy is it for us, that " we fear not the San-benito." P. 24. I can anfwer for myself, and so I may for Mr. F. that we would not by word or deed contribute a fingle mite towards the corporal punishment of the greatest heretic upon earth for conscience-sake; and that any abridgment of the civil or religious liberties of our christian brethren, would fill our hearts with emotions of fympathetic concern. And while we detest the thought of feeing any pious Protestant habited in a San-benito; we at the fame time earnestly recommend to the remarker, the lovely array of a meek and quiet spirit: and when to that he adds the clothing of humility, it will effectually expel from his imagination all those "horrid scenes" of flames and devils, of fire and faggot, with which it teems; and reprefent to his mind the more pleafing fcenes of virtue and truth.—But he goes on. "Shame on " that man who would with to fee our liberty " abridged the breadth of an hair." Amen! And shame on the man who falfly infinuates that we wish such an abridgment.-" I could not have " thought that Mr. D. would have thrown out " fuch things, as my eyes have feen in his " letter." Such things! What things? In order, once for all, to repel the force, and detect the falshood of the malevolent innuendo sculking under the term " fuch things;" and to expose the difingenuity of the remarker, who would infinuate, in the face of the most candid declarations, that we want the privileges of Diffenters abridged; I beg leave to quote a fentiment I dropped, in p. 10, of my Letter to a Baptist-minister, which will abundantly fatisfy the candid reader, that there is no more truth in the remarker's injurious infinuations, than there is reality in the "horrid " scenes" represented to his befrighted imagination. "You are fafely screened from the storm " of perfecution by the shelter of a gracious tolera-" tien: AGAINST THE PRIVILEGES OF WHICH. "I WOULD NOT FOR THE WORLD LEVEL A " SINGLE PLEA." -- Now, gentle reader, weigh this declaration in the ballance of candor and common common fense; and then judge, with what degree of justice Mr. T. can infinuate, that we intend, by our publications, either to have his brethren deprived of their liberties, or their perfons arrayed in Popith San-benitos. And should not a man, whose infinuations are confronted by contradictory facts, blush for his notorious perversion of truth?—Indeed our author is so led away by the ignis fatuus of his own imagination, and the delufory scenes painted before it, that I cannot help declaring he frequently transgresses the bounds of truth. For instance. In the same page, he infinuates that (1) " I was " too fiff to hear Mr. M." This infinuation contains a double falshood. (2) "That I had used " methods to inform myfelf of his proceedings." This is a fecond falshood, equally notorious with the first. (3) "That I had interlarded my Let-"ter with every thing disgraceful to Mr. M.'s " conduct, and to that of his fect." Here is a cluster of falthoods, not inferior in magnitude, and equal in aggravation, to any of the former two; and if the remarker always possesses such a knack at invention, as he discovers in his late performance, particularly in the few excerpta I have just taken from it; we may assure ourselves he will never be at a loss for a subject to write upon.

III. But the most illustrious specimens of our author's modesty, candor, and charity, are yet behind. As they concern me, they are therefore

Let

Let us glean together the whole crop.

I He compares me to a PORTER. " It looks " more like the vain jangling of porters over a " pot of beer." P. 1.

2 Soon after I am transformed into the greatest THIEF. " The greatest thief will cry thief

" first." P. 9.

3 SACRILEGE and duplicity are laid at my door. " Dost thou commit facrilege?-This is "duplicity with a witness." P. 8.

4 I am first in INIQUITY. " This is unfair

" indeed. You are first in iniquity." P. 9.

5 The charge of BLINDNESS is brought against me in terms equally explicit. " I with it may " please God to open your eyes." P. 14.

6 I am represented as NOT BAPTIZED as a Christian, nor baptizing as a minister of Christ; confequently as possessing no valid claim to the character of either. "Tis your duty to be bap-" tized, and to baptize, as a Christian, and a " minister of Christ." Ibid.

7 The still more awful charge of being a ZEA-LOUS OPPOSER OF THE TRUTH AS IN JESUS, is brought against me. " It is no new thing for " a zealous opposer to become a zealous defender

" of the truth as it is in Jefus." Ibid.

8 I am compared to "Saul of Tarfus, burning " with horrid rage against the poor Baptists." P. 15. 9 He fays, I REJECT THE COUNSEL OF GOD.

"Let me caution you, that (like the phari-" fees and lawyers) you do not reject the counsel

" of God, not being baptized." Ibid.

TO He implicitly styles me a VIOLATER OF GOD'S COMMANDS; an UNSCRIPTURAL INNOVATOR; and a RIDICULER and DEFAMER of a glorious ordinance. "Make haste and delay not to keep this divine command. Renounce unscriptural innovations—and stand forth a defender of that glorious ordinance, which you have endeavored to ridicule and defame." P. 16. II I am a BLASPHEMER. "Men are determined to contradict the great and holy God to his face." P. 21.

12 A TRADITIONALIST. P. 22.

13 Almost a MADMAN, that has RAGED at an uncommon rate. "—But in the other, I had "almost said, the madman.—You never could "have raged at the rate you have done." P. 29.

14 One that has put forth his hand against the LORD's ark. "Did the oxen shake the ark?" and did you put forth your hand?" Ibid.

15 I am accused as an offender of God and an Abuser of men. "— If your con"fcience don't accuse you of offending God, as "well as of abusing men." P. 30.

16 As one that fights Against the truth; uses carnal weapons; writes in the same style and spirit with Saul the unbeliever; and is exceeding Mad, breathing out threatning, &c. "— Should conscience tell you that "you have fought against the truth; that the "weapons of your warfare are carnal; that you have wrote against baptism and the Baptists "have wrote against baptism and the Baptists in the same style and spirit, Saul of Tarsus "would

" would have done, before he believed --- that "you are exceeding mad against them; breathe out threatenings, &c." (I declare it is well our author did not add "flaughter" too) " should " conscience remind you of these things; which "God grant!" P. 31.

17 I am represented as an UNBELIEVER and IGNORANT. "The time may come, when you " will confess you did it ignorantly in unbelief.

18 As a CARNAL DEIST, or one DESTITUTE OF THE GRACE OF GOD. "If a poor carnal " Deist or any body destitute of the grace of God, " had wrote in fuch a style, &c. It is language " EXACTLY AGREEING to a carnal heart." P. 32.

19 As a DELIBERATE AND PUBLIC SNEERER at things facred. "When I fee you deliberately " and publicly fneering things facred, &c." P. 33. 20 As an INFORMER. "Views confishent with " the character of an informer." P. 35.

21 As an "ASSASSINATOR of the character

22 He infinuates that I wish the Anabaptists either in hell or at the stake. "I hope you " don't grudge the Baptists their watery grave, " and wish them in a WARMER climate." P. 37. 23 After all those heavy charges, our author, in perfect confishency with himself, infinuates, I am out of the way of salvation. "That it " may please God to lead you into the good " old way." P. 39.

24 As if I had committed a crime of the most grievous nature, he summons me to the judgment-seat of Christ. What my doom would be if Mr. T. were appointed affeilor to the Judge, or if the sentence were to be issued in strict correspondence with our author's charitable system, it is not my bufiness to determine. The reader may form what opinion he thinks most naturally deducible from the following dark hints. "Let " me tell you, Sir, facred things are not to be trifled with. You and I must furely and short-" ly stand before a high tribunal, and an im-"partial Judge. There must we give up our "accounts."-To the unbounded clemency of that Judge, and to the impartial equity of his tribunal, I most readily make my humble appeal, from the most unhallowed zeal and flagrant uncharitableness, that ever difgraced the character of one, who fustains the office of a minister of the gospel; and who, as a poor finful worm. must himself hang upon that infinite mercy in Christ Jesus, to which he and his zealous brother. of Liverpool are fo charitable as to confign me. Whatever fentiments these men entertain respecting their Pædobaptist brother; he begs leave to affure them, that even in the face of some unfavorable facts, which fwerve from the royal law of love by a most notorious deviation, he nevertheless still retains the most sincere benevolence towards their perfons; defires to exercife towards them that charity in its amplest extent, which hopeth all things and covereth all things ;

things; and wishes them no other harm, than that they "may stand perfect and complete in "all the will of GoD."

But let me now beg leave to prefent the reader with one compendious view of the modest and charitable epithets, contained in the foregoing list; with which the remarker has ornamented his late production. "A PORTER-The great-" est THIEF—Chargeable with SACRILEGE and "DUPLICITY --- FIRST in iniquity ---- BLIND-" Neither baptized nor laptizing as a CHRISTIAN " or a MINISTER OF CHRIST.—A ZEALOUS

"OPPOSER of the truth as in Jesus.—A RE"JECTER of the counsel of God—A VIOLATER " of God's commands; an unfcriptural INNO-VATOR; a RIDICULER and DEFAMER of a "glorious ordinance — A BLASPHEMER — A
"TRADITIONALIST — Almost a MADMAN —— " One that has TOUCHED THE ARK-An OF-" FENDER of GOD and an ABUSER of men-" A FIGHTER against the truth; using CARNAL-" weapons, and writing in the SAME style and " and spirit with SAUL-An UNBELIEVER and IGNORANT; exceeding MAD against the Bap-" tifts, and breathing out THREATENINGS, &c. " -As a carnal Deist; or one destitute of " THE GRACE OF GOD-A deliberate and public sneerer at things facred--An informer--"An ASSASSINATOR of the character of a body of " people—Out of the good old way." &c. &c. &c. This is the goodly string of mild appellations, charitable fentiments, and gentle charges, scattered by the hand of bigotry throughout the "Remarks." The mild author of them, is the identical person, who introduces his book with a wish that "the disputants about baptism would "govern their tempers, and reason with calmness." But, if the remarker seriously intended that his wish should be answered, he ought first to have exemplified his own calm sentiments. Whereas, to name his precept, and instantly to contradict it by his practice, is such glaring inconsistency, as reminds me of the conduct of those Divines who take a text, and sight against it all the fermon through. But I cannot dismiss this curious collection of epithets without a few strictures.

I It is the observation of a fine writer, that "Fair honesty uses, tho' a sharp, yet an unstained "weapon; while bigotry strikes with one em"poisoned, though much duller." Apply this spirited sentiment to our remarker, and it will be found to suit him to a hair. The weapon he uses is stained with the venom of bigotry: A poison this, which injures no hand so effectually, as that which holds it. With his sword, which is manifestly sabricated from materials of wood, he deals about his blows exceedingly thick: sometimes rushing with dreadful sury upon a man of straw of his own making; at other times, with huge knight-errantry, encountering "horrid" scenes," which exist no where but in the Utopia of his befrighted imagination; often making most formidable attacks upon reason, against whose impenetrable shield our author's wooden weapon goes all to pieces; almost constantly invading the hallowed land of charity, whose untainted air neither generates nor agrees with bigots; and not seldom combating with common sense. Reader, pity me! when you reslect that I am dragged into the field of controversy by such a wooden artist; who seems to mistake passion for argument, the sirebrand of bigotry for christian zeal, the dogmas of self-sufficiency for solid reason, the thread-bare cant of a party-spirit for genuine charity, and, who in so many instances stands

"Unaw'd by danger of offence, "The fatal enemy of SENSE."

2 Would not the reader naturally suppose, when he takes a retrospective view of the preceding epithets, that the remarker had exhausted his whole stock? especially when it is considered that he has ranfacked the vileft, and the most horrid fimiles for ideas? --- from the vulgarity of the porter, up to the villainy of the thief; and from the madman, down to the blindest ignoramus? I fay, when we have been favored with fuch a variety of these delicate wares; would not the reader naturally conclude that our author would, in future, turn bankrupt in comparisons, illustrations, dogmas, anathemas and abuse? To obviate fuch a conclusion, I will tell the reader a secret. Bigotry is a hot-bed, composed of all those warm ingredients, calculated to throw up every species of fungus. When one crop is gathered, another as numerous and inftantaneous, fucceeds. As, therefore, a copious descent of rain occasions a rapid growth of the fungous produce; so the prolific mind of a bigot receives additional fertilization from a fmart thower of penetrating arguments. And the ranker the foil, the richer the crop. So that if our remarker's mind, amply enriched with every compost necessary for the production of funguses, hath already supplied us with a good fpring-crop; may we not expect a fill more luxuriant harvest in a future season? And if we may be permitted to judge of the interiora of bigotry, as we do of a hot-bed, by the fcent of its exhalations; I think our author's unind bids as fair for fending forth a goodly favor, as that of any inflammable zealot within the confines of bigotry. But whether the hot bed, or the steam that ascends from it, be likely to give any additional perfume to the garden enclosed, or to flock it with any other produce, fave that which shoots from the fungus of bigotry; I fancy the pious reader will eafily judge.

3 When the remarker, from stark charity, brands me on the back with the gentle stigmas of "an opposer of the truth—a defamer—" almost a madman—a traditionalist—neither bap-"tized, nor baptizing as a Christian—a rejecter, "of the counsel of God—touching baptism, an "unbeliever, &c. &c." I only regret, that he did not previously attempt to demonstrate by dint of argument, that these appellations were as just as they are abusive. But I beg this gentleman's Sf 2 pardon;

pardon; argument is not his province. What did he write for, then? Did he think that a little anonymous fquib, stuffed with his foolish dogmas, would be admitted by the public as an answer to a book, a fingle argument in which he has not discussed, either as a Divine or a Logician? Did he expect that people of common fense, would fwallow his dogmatic pills, because rolled in the fost powder of his " undoubtedlys, most " certainlys, round affirmations?" Or did he suppose that abuse and argument are terms convertible? He fays, p. 32, "that I have given room " for the most finging recrimination." But with what kind of fing would he arm his recriminations? If with that of argument; what a pity he did not unsheath it, in all its terrific poignancy! Hitherto, I have felt nothing, half as formidable as the sting of a gnat; and the finger's ABUSE, refembles the impotent buzz of that feeble infect. A friend lately affured me, that by commencing a dispute with Anabaptists, "I had "thrown myself into a nest of hornets." These are dreadful creatures; to be fure; but the remarker is not one of them. He has lost his sting; or rather never had one; if I may infer from the obtuseness and dulness of his late performance. And if he does not acquire a literary aculeus, by the time he writes again, we thall only rank him among the harmless and promiscuous winged multitudes, that bask unnoticed and unnumbered in the fummer-fun; and which, after a temporary existence, buzz their last, and are buried buried in oblivion.—But our author can fling dirt, though he cannot fling. And his recriminations look, as if they fprung from that fpurious fource. No wonder then, if they are as light in their nature, as they are base in their origin. Naturalists inform us, that mud is prolific in flies; and therefore that multitudes of these winged insects come "In squalid legions from the mud of Nile."

Our author's recriminations have hitherto proceded from a fimilar muddy fource; and if his future stings do not improve confiderably, they will merit a re-confignment to their parent—MUD!

IV. Procede we now from the inflances of the remarker's charity and candor, to the rare specimens of his logic.—(1) Speaking of his brethren in this town, he pays me the following huge compliment. "I suppose some of them "were very fond of you, as a good man, and a "good preacher. But I am ready to think, "you have pretty well cured them of this." So, according to our supposer, before I wrote in defence of Infant-baptism, I was "a good man "and a good preacher." But since I committed this unpardonable offence, all my goodness, either as a man or a preacher, is evaporated. There's a compound of charitable logic for you, reader!

(2) The following fentence,—" Give in their experience to the church," I introduced in my Letter to a Baptist-minister; and without making making a fingle observation on it, marked it with commas, as a quotation from the language of Anabaptists. This circumstance, in itself so inoffentive, awakens at once our author's indignation and logic. For, he fays, "This you " mark with commas, IN ORDER to flab its re-" putation. P. 31." So, according to this wonderful remarker, a quotation must never be marked with commas; for to his befrighted imagination, full of "horrid scenes," these innocent marks prefixed and postfixed, look like so many daggers, intended to stab the sentence through and through. Well, I affure this gentleman, if ever he palms upon the public, any more of his nonfenfical Remarks, I am determined to wound them with commas, and fomething else a little more pointed.

- (3) P. 9, he fays, "An apprehension that baptism is essential to salvation, gave rise to infant-sprinkling." So bold a declaration ought to be supported by a demonstration equally bold. So it is. En! argumentum palmarium! "I will go surther, and roundly affirm that—I AM "sure of it."—There, reader; don't you think this man ought to be dubbed Logician Laureat, for his huge and unparalleled knack at argumentation?
- (4) P. 13, he affirms that "believers' bap"tism is supported by precept and precedent."
 But how does he prove his affirmation? Thus!
 -- "SURELY IT MUST EE RIGHT."—Risum teneatis, amici?

(5) Another

(5) Another more weighty argument fill, occurs ibid. "How do we know that Infant-" baptism is an error? From the intire silence " of fcripture about it." That fcripture is not intirely filent upon this important particular, I hope to prove in its proper place. But I must let the remarker go on.—In order to prove that, men and women are "the proper subjects of bap-" tism," he quotes Acts v. 14. Upon which he fays, "the want of that one word (children) "must fink your cause for ever." Aye, doubtless; when fuch a heavy milstone of an argument hangs about its neck; and fuch a heavy logician ties the burden on. But, in order farther to clarify and corroborate his ponderous logic, he fays that "transubstantiation has fomething like "proof in scripture," (the Papists will thank the remarker for his half-way concession); "for in-" flance; CHRIST fays, This IS my body." However, lest we should imagine he was a Roman Catholic on this point, he fets about confuting it. " How "do we know that transubstantiation is an error, and how do we prove it? We say" (is that proving?) "the words of CHRIST are to be under-" flood metaphorically." But might not a Papist very justly reply in the same strain of arguing? "We say the words of Christ are not to be " understood metaphorically." Alas! for poor Protestantism! if it rested upon no sirmer a basis, than that of the paultry logic of our remarker! I'm fure, if he was to engage in a controverfy with a Fesuit of the lowest class, our cause in the hands hands of fuch a fumbling logician; would cut but a poor figure. And if our author is no more skilled in the controversy about baptism, than he feems qualified for refuting the abfurdity of transubstantiation; I would advise him never again to shew his face in the field of this controverfy; unless he can, with phlegmatic patience; fubmit to the mortification of beinglaughed at.—But let us fee, how his method of attacking a Popish tenet will apply to baptism. He fays, that "the want of one word (children) " in Acts v. 14, will fink our cause for ever." Then he quotes, (quite mal-apropos in my opinion) the words of our Savior, on which the Papists ground their favorite tenet; which he refutes by faying (for it is impossible to call it arguing) "that the words are to be understood " metaphorically." But might not the Papist justly urge our author's own reasoning in favor of adult-baptism, against his logic about transubstantiation. q. d. "Mr. Remarker, you say, that " the omission of one word in Acts v. 14, sinks "the cause of the Psedobaptists for ever. Yet " in commenting upon our SAVIOR's words, " you fay we are to understand him as declar-" ing, This is (METAPHORICALLY) my body. " But, Mr. Remarker, where is the word meta-" phorically written? Will not, (to adopt your " own argument and your own words) the want " of that one word (metaphorically) fink your cause " for ever? and lie a dead weight on your cause, " when you, Mr. Remarker, are no more?"-Thus

(6) A hint I dropped, respecting the utility of a liturgical fervice, in order to guide a public congregation in their addresses to God, furnishes our author with a fresh opportunity of displaying his logic. According to custom he tells a little story, which he borrows from one whom he styles "a droll hand." P. 28. But it contains fuch a mixture of profanity and drollery together, that I will not recite it, even though it comes authenticated from the pen of the pious remarker himself. Indeed he seems suspicious that his borrowed flory fails in argument as well as decency: for he fays, "However, I will not " dispute these points with you." But though he declines disputation on this head, yet he favors us with his humble opinion. "My opinion is "that reading is neither praying nor preaching."*

* N.B. I beg leave to consider this unguarded affertion of our author.——I. As to preaching: to preach is predicare vertum Dei, to publish or declare the word of God. Whether this publication of truth be performed ex-tempore, memoriter, or by notes, it is preaching: because the particular mode does not affect the thing itself. And, tho' it is much to be wished, that the use of notes were more out of fashion; if for no other end but that of ascertaining the originality of the preacher's manufactures: yet, to make preaching the absolute monopoly of an ex-tempore mode, is at once to depretiate a well-digested composition because it is read; and to dignify with the undeserved title of preaching, every the grosself piece of incoherence, merely because it is poured forth without notes; and perhaps without premeditation, arrangement, or connexion. So far am I, therefore, from being a pro-

felyte to our author's doctrine on this head; that, although I wish as much as possible to discountenance the use of those pulpit-crutches: yet, I had rather liften to the reading of a well-connected discourse at any time, than to declamatory effusions delivered ex tempore, when the matter and manner exhibit a difgusting mixture of aukward vociferation and immethodical rant. -- II. When the remarker fays, " reading is not praying," he might have added, "nor is ex-tempore " essusion, praying:" for, the mode is not the thing. effence, is the spiritual breathing of the heart God-ward; and may therefore be performed without any verbal expression whatever. As the mode of expression does not necessarily enter into the nature of the duty; confequently the difference of the mode does not in the least affect the thing. Words are but the clothing of our thoughts; and the manner in which the former are expressed, cannot injure the existence of the latter. Would not any person of common sense stare at that man, who should argue, that a person cannot think, because he methodizes his thoughts, and cloathes them in a form of well-digested expression? or that reading an excellent composition, which is the result of deep study, is not thinking? Equally absurd is our remarker, who would exclude praying from one mode, and confine it to another. But his absurdity will appear still more evident, if we consider, (1) That if none can be faid to pray but fuch as present their addresses ex tempore; then this extemporaneous mode is effential to prayer. But this is contradicted by matter of fact. For, a man may by mere dint of ingenuity, vent his thoughts in prayer as well as in preaching, without any premeditation, and yet be destitute of any spirituality in either. Many a professor of religion has acquired an astonishing volubility in uttering words ex tempore in prayer; who notwithstanding has never experienced the gift of praying with the spirit. Therefore an ex-tempore effusion no more constitutes the effence of prayer, than a similar mode is effential to deep thinking. (2) If reading a well-digested form be not praying; then those who practice that mode of congregational devotion, are wholly flut out of all pretentions to the effence of a duty, which enters into the very nature of true christianity: and fince the disciples of our Lord prayed by a form prescribed to them by their great Master; according to our author's logic, they did not pray at all. (3) It is notorious, that many ministers, who loudly exclaim against a form, are guilty of equal formality with those, from whom they differ. For, I myself have heard the same prayers used without the smallest variation, from the beginning to the end of the year; only with this trifling difference, that instead of being written, they " mendation of any thing, is no proof of the legality or utility of it." And let me remind Our were delivered memoriter. (4) Confidering how many are palpably difqualified for being the mouth of the people, in the folemn duty of prayer; and how frequently congregrations are obliged to liften to effutions, replete with irreverence, vain repetition, and grofs impropriety of language; to obviate such disagreeable incidents, as well as to afford the congregation an opportunity of uniting equally with the minister in their joint addresses to the divine Majesty; scripture and the very nature of things concur to prescribe such a public form, as may at once affift the minister, and edify the people. And so fully was the illustrious Reformer of Geneva convinced of the great utility of fuch a public form, that Fuller, in his Church-History, Book vii. P. 426, fays, "Master Calvin is therein" (i. e. in his Letter to the Protector,) " very positive for a SETT FORM: whose words deserve. our translation and observation. Formulam precum (faith Calvin) & rituum ecclesiasticorum valde probo, ut certa illa extet; a qua ne pastoribus difcedere in functione suil liceat: I Ut consulatur quorundam simplicitati & imperitie. 2 Ut certius constet omnium inter se ecclesiarum consensus. 3 Ut obviant incatur desultorie quorundam levitati, qui novationes quasdam affectant. Sic igitur statum esse catechismum oportet, statam sacramentorum administrationem, publicam item precum formulam." That is: " I do HIGHLY APPROVE that there should be a CERTAIN FORM of prayer, and ecclesiastical rites; from which it should not be lawful for the pastors themselves to depart. I That provision may be made for some people's ignorance and unskilfulness. 2 That the CONSENT of all the churches among themfelves may more plainly appear. 3 That ORDER may be taken against the unsettled levity of such as delight in innovations. Thus there ought to be an established CATECHISM, an established administration of SACRAMENTS, as also a PUBLIC FORM OF PRAYER."-See Mr. Toplady's Historic Proof, &c. P. 370. This testimony is the more valuable, as it procedes not from a Churchman, who might be suspected of undue attachment to his own ecclesiastical rites, but from an impartial Prefbyterian; whose opinion is at once declarative both of his wisdom and his candor; as well as decifive against some popular out-cries of modern bigotry. (5) I mean not that either the Lord's ministers or people should be tied down wholly to a form; nor is it the original defign of our church that they should; and we hope, our brethren that differ from us on this head, have full conviction, that Church-men can occasionally drop their forms in every branch of their public ministrations, and appear to as great advantage as others. All we contend for, is; in order that a public congregation should not be

always left at the mercy of extemporaneous (and often erroneous) effufions; that the officiating minister should deliver himself, especially in his petitionary addresses to God, with truth and propriety; and that the congregation may be able to follow him through this important. branch of his public work, with edification; we think a liturgical fervice, on these accounts, of the highest utility. I know it is often urged, in the language of Mr. Benjamin Wallin, that our fervice is "a " form of human invention." But how trifling is the objection? If Anabaptists inveigh at our liturgy, because it is a form; the same ground of invective would lie against the Lord's prayer, and the disciples who used it .- But it is "a form of invention." And what then? If it be according to truth, is it invalidated, because it is an invention? " I NEVER THOUGHT" (fays Mr. Baxter, in his Plain Scripture-Proof, P. 271,) " all things of human invention in Gon's worship, either " will-worship, or unlawful. Many circumstantials must be for the " species of human determination or invention, which God hath de-" termined only in genere: THAT IS THE DOCTRINE OF THE OLD NON-" CONFORMISTS." -- Why should not ministers, in praying as well as preaching, strive "to find out acceptable words"? Is not an invention, which is the refult of deep meditation and feripture-inquiry, as much calculated to edify, as an ex-tempore one? Or is a prayer, delivered ex-tempore, less an invention, than one studied and read? Has not the latter the confiderable advantage of being a well-digested composition? while the former, being an extemporaneous invention, is frequently encumbered with repetition, and improper, not to fay irreverent, expression? Why should not a minister, under the inspiration of the Almighty, with his Bible before him, and his heart lifted up in prayer to the fountain of wisdom, find out and compose as edifying a prayer, as a man, who stands up in a pulpit, and, without any premeditation, pours forth his petitionary addresses, in language not always proper, and in a manner, fometimes perhaps deftitute of reverence, as well as fense? Why should the one be condemned under the depretiating epithet of an "invention?" and the other, not? Archbishop Cranmer, for instance, composes in his fludy an excellent collect, full of truth, and expressive of the foul's devout breathing heaven-ward. Mr. Wallin, or Mr. Turner, or Mr. Any-body-else, delivers his addresses ex-tempore, in language unpremeditated and undigested. We will suppose that Mr. W. or Mr. T. speaks down-right nonfense, or utters palpable error, in his intercesfory effusions. Shall the former be run down as an "invention," beof candor, and of decency) "is no proof" of the illegality or inutility of it.—Though he "takes" leave" of this point, yet with strange inconfishency, he resumes it in the very next sentence; and inveighs at our Liturgy, by an abusive comparison between it, and Diana, the abomination of the Ephesians; and between those who use our Liturgy, and the heathen worshipers of that cause it is studied; and the latter cried up, merely because it is an invention, unfludied and undigested? By this strange arguing, an invention of ex-tempore nonsense or error, may be proved of superior sanctity to the most folid composition, because it is read. - But our Liturgy, is "a form of buman invention." And is not an ex-tempore prayer a "human" invention? If Mr. Wallin objects to our formulary, because something human enters into its composition; then all his own ex-tempore effusions must be-altogether divine: otherwise his objection has no force. But if he mean, that the prayers of our church are absolutely "human," as containing nothing of God and truth, but every thing of man's frailty; he is grossly mistaken. The compilers of our Liturgy, it is true, were men; and fo are their modern objectors. But they were men-of eminent learning-of genuine piety----and of deep acquaintance with the scriptures. They were Reformers, Martyrs --- men, who fealed the truth with their blood. And, although their compositions, as to their verbal clothing, are human: yet, as to their intrinsec worth, they are divine. For, if the inherent gold of gospel-truths may be faid to render a production divine; there is then as much of divinity in the Liturgical services of our church, as in any or all the ex-tempore.compositions of Anabaptists; from the first founder of that feet, down to Mr. Benjamin Wallin aforesaid. And, as well to give a fanction to our sentiments on this fubject, as to point out the divine original, from which we derive the use of a form of prayer; I present the remarker with the following lines, which I would advise him to consider maturely.

"Hose, Joel, and Isaiah,
Were Jews, as well as Hezekiah,
Yet us'd and taught a form of pray'r;
Their works say how, and when, and where.
In after-times, the saints, we find,
Were taught by Him, whom all should mind;
A certain form of pray'r to use,
Fit or for Christians, or for Jews."

abominable idol. To which piece of irreligious and inconclusive affimilation I cannot better reply, than in our author's own words, which immediately follow. "But what was all this to "the purpose? Just NOTHING."—He is very angry, because I have hinted at Mr. M.'s disqualification for making any improvement in our Liturgy; and fays, "I think just the contrary. "Did you ever fee a human performance that "could not be improved?" Oh! the man's logic! I fay, Mr. Medley does not possess abilities fufficient to fuggest an improvement in our liturgical fervice. Ergo, I fay it cannot be improved at all. That is, according to our logician, Mr. M. is every-body; and to fay, a composition cannot be improved by him, is to affirm it will admit of no improvement at all! Excellent!-He feems extremely happy in the supposition, that he does not want a Liturgy. "I can tell you "of fome who do not need it." Whoever they are, the remarker is not one of them. For, if I may be permitted to form a judgment of his abilities in the pulpit, by his late production from the press; I'm fure he does " need" a Liturgy to affift him in his ministrations: and as I know of none fuperior to that used by the Church of England, I therefore most earnestly recommend it to Mr. T.'s pious adoption: and if method, argument, language, modesty, charity, and a proper application of scripture-analogy, have any thing to do in the delivery of public discourses; I should imagine the remarker, of all preachers living, ought to fludy these necessary ingredients; and to trust rather to well-digested notes, than either to his memory or his invention. Those who cannot walk without crutches, appear doubly lame, when they

(7) More logic still! He fays, p. 25. "What has a passage in Genesis to do with baptism?" The passage he refers to, is that which I have prefixed as the motto, to the title-page of my Letter to a Baptist-Minister; and is the following. I will be A GOD to thee, and to thy SEED after thee. In an improvement of this covenant-promise, made to Abraham and his feed, of which circumcision under the law, was a confirming sign and feal, as baptism is, under the gospel; I have advanced some arguments, which, it is manifest, our remarker knows not what to do with. According to his usual method, he passes them over in perfect filence; which his prudence judged most advisable. But on the scripture-analogy, which fupports these arguments he makes an indirect attack; by asking such a question, as would incline one to suspect, that he thought the Old Testament contrary to the New; that it was unfcriptural to argue from the authority of the one, to that of the other; or that a divine institution under the latter, can receive no fanction from the records of the former. An infinuation this, which, at the fame time that it loudly proclaims our author's ignorance of fcripture-analogy, has a tendency to arm the hands of infidels with weapons against divine revelation. The grand objection, objection, which our author makes to the fcripture from Genesis, as well as to other correspondent passages, both in the Old and New Testament, is, that they are not "plain texts of "fcripture." So he argues (p. 25:) "There is "nothing like plain texts of scripture for carrying conviction." That is; the word baptism is not mentioned verbatim and literatim in the paffage; and therefore it is not a "plain text;" and cannot be admitted as an evidence in favor of the subject. But the objector should know, that as the Old Testament is an obscure revelation of the will of God, fome of the plainest, as well as most important doctrines of christianity, lie concealed therein, under the veil of mystery; and that the prophetic language which cloathes them, is for the most part, dark and mysterious. If therefore, passages, in that obscure part of revelation, are inadmissible as evidences to any particular truth, merely because they are not syllabically "plain;" I am afraid fuch reasoning will, not only tend to invalidate the arguments, in favor of revelation, founded on the divine connexion between the writings of the prophets and the apostles; but likewise to strike at the authority of the whole Old Testament.

Suppose our author had been present, when our LORD vindicated the doctrine of a future resurrection, against the cavils of the Sadduces; as recorded in Matth. xxii. 31, 32. The scripture upon which Jesus sounded his arguments on that occasion, is a quotation from Exod. iii. 6.

"I am

is I am the God of Abraham, and the God of "Ifaac, &c." This fcripture contains a covenant-declaration, the same in substance with that in Gen. xvii. 7. If therefore the want of the word baptism, in the latter passage, be a proof that it cannot have any reference to that fign of the covenant; the want of the word resurrection in the former, must, according to the same mode of arguing, be admitted as a demonstration, that Exod. iii. 6, cannot evince the rising of the dead. And, if the remarker had made one among the circle of the Sadducees just mentioned, should he not have objected to our LORD's quotation from Exodus, in the following manner. q. d. "Don't "tell me of your quotations from the Old Testa-" ment.—There's nothing like plain texts of " fcripture to carry conviction.—What has " text in Exodus to do with the resurrection?-"The want of that one word (refurrection) must fink your cause for ever." Thus the remarker's wonderful logic is retorted upon himfelf: and the retort proves at once the profanity and absurdity of his reasoning; because it shews, that, as Gen. xvii. 7, is not a plain text, and therefore according to him, not to be admitted in favor of baptim; for the fame reason our Lord's quotation from Exodus, not being a "plain text," ought not to be allowed as decifive for the doctrine of the refurrection: and, it is fubmitted to the judgment of a reader of the smallest discernment, whether, upon the fame principle that the remarker is an oppugner of Infant-baptism, FT 17

he ought not to commence a Sadducee. For, if the want of what he styles plainness in one passage of scripture from the Old Testament determines him against Infant-baptism; why should not a similar circumstance, in another passage, six his determinations against the doctrine of a suture resurrection?—So much for the remarker's thoughts on plain texts, and the plain absurdity which plainly attends his reasoning on them.

(8) In p. 18, the remarker affects the Critic. He talks about "the import of the Greek,—the " joint authority of the best writers,—the joint " testimony of lexicographers, as sufficient to " fix the fense of a word, -of writers, both sa-" cred and profane, ancient and modern, &c." When I first dropped on this passage, the style of which is so extremely turgid, I thought, 'Well, now we may expect fomething greater than a fewundoubtedlys, round affirmations, most certainlys, &c. Surely our author is now going to enter upon a ferious examination of his subject, and will favor us with fomething more conclusive than his mere ipse dixit.' But it was a mountain in labor, and the production disappointed my expectations. Our remarker only talked about these "numerous au-"thorities,"-about them, reader, and about them -for, lo! he has not produced one of them. And, indeed, why should I be surprised at this ridiculous iffue of fuch a pompous exordium? when I hear him declare for his brethren, that " they pay no REGARD to church-history, fa-"thers, fynods, criticisms on the Greek, &c?" Ibid. Yet,

Yet, after faying, he "paid no regard to cri"ticifins on the Greek," he, in the very next fentence, fays, "However, LET US PAY a mo"ment's attention to the import of the Greek?" Thus he fays and unfays; advances and retreats; vindicates and contradicts himself, in the same breath! Rare mode of disputation! To what end is it thus conducted? "For fashion's fake" truly! That is; the remarker " pays no regard " to criticisms on the Greek," because that is his " fathion:" but " he DOES PAY a moment's " attention to the import of the Greek," because it is our "fathion." Inimitable condescension! Astonishing ingenuity of our critical fashion maker! Search the whole compass of letters; examine the whole circle of the literati; rummage all the productions of authors, facred or profane, antient or modern, in prose or verse; and I dare fay fuch a "fashion" of criticizing and commenting, as this of our author, was never before introduced into the literary world!---After, therefore, mentioning "the authority of "the best writers" without producing ONE: after promifing "to pay a moment's attention " to the import of the Greek," without fulfilling his promise:—after declaring "it has been "proved to a demonstration that εαπτίζω fig-"nifies to plunge or overwhelm, only," without fo much as even attempting to stumble on such proof:-after raifing our expectations to a prodigious pitch, by talking of the "best writers, lu 2 "facred" "facred and profane, &c. &c." what is the upshot of all this puff? Reader, summon up all your gravity. For, if your risible muscles were as rigid as even those of Heraclitus himself, I, am certain, what follows will make an irresistible shock upon them.—" It must be undoubtedly "Certain that plunging is baptizing; and that "sprinkling is not baptizing." P. 21.—This is our author's "fashion of paying attention to the im"port of the Greek!" Well, learned reader, don't you think this fashion perfectly new? And, for the introduction of it, does not the author bear away the palm from all the writers antient and modern?

Cedite Romani scriptores, cedite Graii!

(9) Although I am well nigh tired out, with reviewing the extraordinary specimens of the remarker's charity, candor and logic; yet I will take the liberty to put my own and the reader's patience to the rack, a little longer.—A simple circumstance—that of only mentioning, without making a single comment on the Anabaptists' method of "giving in experiences"—has thrown our author into such a rage, that he hardly keeps up common decency in his language, or common charity in his sentiments. If his animadversion which follows, savored only of the abusive, at which the remarker has a scurrilous adroitnes; I should probably pass it over in silence. But, as it teems with falshood, and reflects an undeserved aspersion on the Church of England,

England, I cannot help attempting, at least, to wipe off the dirt, which this Anabaptist zealot flings at our Alma Mater. Hark! how he falfifies and abuses, in a breath. "There is no "fuch custom in your church. The thief, the "whore-monger, the blasphemer, &c. may approach "your communion-table, and no question asked, "or notice taken." P. 32. That the Church of England does not require her members to give in written accounts of their knowledge in re-ligion, is certain. But, that she is, therefore, remis and indifferent about those pre-requisites, necessary in an approach to her communion, is equally false. Let any person of candor only peruse her solemn exhortations preparatory to the Lord's supper; and the several branches of falutary discipline contained in her communion-fervice; and then let him fay, whether our church, as Mr. Turner shamefully infinuates, to-lerates those beasts of the people "thieves, whore-"mongers and blasphemers," to approach the most facred ordinance in her ritual. So remote is her discipline from such horrid profanation, that she arms herfelf with all the terrific denuntiations of God's word, in order to prohibit the impious and ignorant from daring to touch the facred fymbols of the Redeemer's body and blood. The following are among the awful warnings the gives to fuch. "If any of you be a blasphemer of God, an hinderer or flanderer of his word, an adulterer, or be in malice or envy, or in any other grievous crime; repent you of your fins, or else come not to that holy table; lest, after taking of that holy facrament, the Devil enter into you, and fill you full of all iniquities, and bring you to destruction both of body and foul."* Nor does our church hold out these alarming declarations merely in terror.m, or put them into the hands of her ecclefiattical fons only as brutum fulmen; but the moreover, in strict conformity to the facred fcriptures, urges upon her Clergy the awful necessity, and invests them with a canonical power, of guarding the holy communion against the unhallowed intrusion of profaneness and irreligion; giving them the strictest charge to expel and admit their communicants, according as they adorn or difgrace, by their conduct, the profession of christianity. Yea, fo strict is the discipline of our church in this respect, that she issues out a prohibition against railers; and under that denomination of inconfistent professors, I am perfuaded, she would include the remarker himself, and not admit him to her table; according to that apostolic injunction in i. Cor. v. 11.

To all this, perhaps, it will be objected, that fome Clergymen in the Church of England are so lax and indiscriminate in the application of discipline, as to incur the charge which the remarker brings against our church in general. But, supposing some ministerial characters justly chargeable with the horrid crime of admitting to their table, the most profane and irreligious; by what rule of candor or logic, is the inconfiftency, of fuch to be fixed upon the church itself? when her whole fervice makes the most rigorous provision against such profanation of her ordinances? Besides, though it must be confessed, that there is a most criminal relaxation of difcipline in the prefent day, particularly respecting the due administration of the LORD's supper; yet there are, bleffed be Gon! some conscientious disciplinarians within the pale of the Church of England, who would as foon cut off their right hands, as permit "the thief, the whoremonger, or " the blasphemer to approach the communion-" table, without taking any notice;" as the remarker falfly infinuates. Yea, I will be bold to fay, and can prove it by flubborn facts, that the excellent conftitution of our church, enables her ministers to act with as great boldness in the delivery of doctrines, or the exercise of discipline, as any, in the circumstances of the remarker.

Thus, have I attended Mr. T. through the principal branches of his Remarks; and cannot but observe, that such productions as his, should always make their appearance, under such circumstances, as are best calculated to conceal the name of the author, and even that of their birth-place:—circumstances, to which the remarker has, hitherto indeed, paid the most artful attention; and for his skilful management of which, he merits the thanks of all the anonymous scribblers of the day. But, as he has now given us a sample fample of his ftyle; whether a fecond production comes forth, with or without a name; we shall be able to determine its origin, by comparing the features of the one with the other; and to decypher the parent, by the correspondent likeness of the offspring. Shou'd he think proper to take up his pen a fecond time, and favor me with more Remarks; I have only to request, that he would think a little, before he writes; and that in writing, he would reason. His productions, hitherto, have proved, that he is extremely deficient in both: and, having acquitted himself so indifferently, here I leave him,

while I present the intelligent reader with the following

EXTRACT from Dr. WATTS'S Sermon, intitled "Christian Baptism," Matth. xxviii. 19. (Which I the rather do, because the sentiments of this great man respecting the mode, at once corroborate and recapitulate some arguments urged in this treatise; as well as shew, how shamefully disingenuous must every attempt be, to press this eminent Divine into the cause of Anabaptism.)

"I procede now," fays the Doctor, "to the inquiry, What is the MANNER of performing this ceremony" of baptism? —— The Greek word $Ca\pi l_i \zeta \omega$, signifies to wash any thing, properly by water coming over it. Now there are several ways of such washing, viz: Sprinkling water on it in small quantity; POURING water on it in larger quantity; or dipping it under water; either in part or in whole. And, since this seems to be left undetermined in scripture to one parto be left undetermined in scripture to one particular mode; therefore, ANY OF THESE WAYS of washing may be sufficient to answer the purpose of this ordinance. Now, that the Greek word signifies washing of a thing in general by water coming over it, and not always by dipping, is argued by learned men, not only from antient Greek authors, but from the New Testament itself; as, Luke xi. 38. "The Pharisees marvelled that "Jesus had not first washed before dinner;" in Greek "was not first baptized:" and can it be supposed that they would have him die himself. fupposed that they would have him dip himself in water?—Mark vii. 4. "The Pharisees, when they come from the market, eat not, except they are washed," i. e. baptized: surely it cannot mean, except they were dipped. And, if this should be restrained to signify washing their hands only, yet it does not necessarily signify dipping them, as "Elisha poured water on the hands of Elisah." ii. Kings, viii. 11 .- Yet further, they practifed the washing of tables (in Greek, of beds), as well as cups and vessels. Now beds, could not usually be washed by dipping.—Heb. ix. 10. The Jews had "divers washings" (in Greek, baptisms) which were SPRINKLING and POURING water on things, as well as plunging them.—i. Cor. x. 2. The children of "Ifrael were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea;" not that they were dipped in the water, but they were SPRINKLED X xby

"Besides, it is said further on this head, that pouring or sprinkling MORE NATURALLY represents most of the sprinkling signified by baptism; viz. the sprinkling of the blood of Christ on the conscience, or the pouring out of the Spirit on the person baptized; or sprinkling him with clean water, as an emblem of the influence of the Spirit: All which are the things signified in baptism, as different representations of the cleansing of the guilt or desilement of sin thereby."

P. S. As I am informed, Mr. M. employed Mr. Joseph Jenkins, of Wrexham, to correct the press for him, (which I suspect to have been the case, from a studied omission in the title-page of Mr. M.'s pamphlet); and as that gentleman hath helped Mr. M. to a note, out of his little 'Systematic Creed,' and, probably, hath "suggested" some more "hints" in the note-making way, to a convenient execution of which his superintending the press quietly contributed: I wish Mr. M. would adopt some method of informing me, what notes were sabricated by himself, and what, by Mr. J; that, in my suture Rejoinder, I may not confound together the sabricators themselves.

engage in disputation; and points out, however, the utility and end of controversy, when duly managed.—Shews how far the debate concerning Infant-baptism is important; and for what reasons it is necessary to oppose Anabaptism.—Gives a little historic sketch of the commencement and progress of the present controversy; and points out the malevolence and ignorance of the twin-disputants, Messrs. Sandys and Parmenas. P, 5—52.

CHAP. I.

The author vindicates himself and his friends, from Mr. M.'s groundless charges and illiberality of low abuse.—Proves that the DECLARATION, attested by ten Anabaptists, is tantamount to an indirect CHALLENGE.—And expostulates with the "SEVERE OPPOSER" on his irreverent mode of attacking Infant-baptism from the pulpit, and on his indelicate manner of abusing certain "endowed" ecclesiastics from the press. P. 53—81.

Mr. M.'s doctrine of the effentiality of dipping farther exposed and refuted.—His explanatory vindications on that head, incur additional abfurdity and glaring self-contradiction—Animadversions on his calling the Church of England, the "daughter of the mother of abominations."—The defamatory appellation, when transfered to the ministers of our church, proved to be inconsistent either with truth or decency.
—Some Queries proposed to Anabaptists, P. 82,—124.

CHAP. III.

Some strictures on Dr. Stemett's confining the idea of dipping to the word baptize.—His virtual charge of our "departing from the au-"thority of Christ, and opening the door to "a thousand innovations of dangerous consequence," retorted and refuted.—Mr. M.'s mode of RIDICULING HIS BRETHREN, exposed; and his attempts to evade the force of my former strictures on that head, proved to be destitute of truth and sair representation.—Some preliminaries stated, respecting the Mode of baptism. P. 125—144.

BAPTISMAL ASPERSION, an emblematical reprefentation of our justification by the blood, and of our fanctification by the Spirit of Christ.—
The objections of Mr. M. and his Oracle on this head, confronted with scripture, reason, and the striking testimonies of Calvin, Beza, Tilenus, Vossius, Lightfoot, &c.——Dr. S.'s criticism on the διαφοροις βαπίσμοις divers baptisms, mentioned in Heb. ix. 10; as well as his wonderful doctrine of genus and species, by which it is supported, proved to be equally fallacious and absurd. P. 175——214.

Mr. M.'s irreverence and abuse farther exposed.

—His arguments, in favor of immersion, taken from the superstitious washings of the Pharises and all the Jews, invalidated.—Beza, Dr. Pocock and Wall, unite in supposing that to be only a washing of the hands, which the apostle calls a being baptized.—The application of the word complex to the bloody baptism of Christ, and to the baptism in the cloud, &c. not necessarily including the idea of immersion.—Examples of baptisms in scripture, considered —The Notemaker's maker's translation of a passage from Witsus, and his indirect charge against us, of blatphemous reasoning, stript of the coloring of falshood, chicanery and sophistry. P. 214—256.

CHAP. VII.

Those passages in the Old Testament and Apocrypha, where the word Carliew occurs, considered.—
Its signification farther ascertained from Critics, Lexicographers, and Divines.—The force of Dr. S's quotations from Calvin, Beza, Vossius, repelled; and the disingenuity of them, detected.
—Some additional testimonies from antiquity in savor of baptismal aspersion.—The debate refumed with the "jevere opposer."—A few heads of advice proposed to his serious consideration. P. 257—288.

The feveral extraordinary specimens of Mr. Turner's MANNER, CHARITY, and LOGICAL REASONING, considered — The falshood, sutility, and malevolence of all his Remarks, exposed.—His criticisms, respecting the mode and subjects of baptism, proved to be nugatory and inconclusive.—The instances of uncharitable judging, scattered throughout his pamphlet, declarative of the true spirit of a "red" hot Anabaptist."
